

The Gospel of Afranius

A Detective Investigation into Sacred History

Original Russian edition © 1997 Kirill Eskov
(afranius999@gmail.com)

English Translation © Zachary Baumgartner
(zachary.m.baumgartner@gmail.com)

Illustrations © 2018 Yevgeny Melnikov (barbus18@ya.ru)

TODO: more

Translator's note:

This translation was produced in close collaboration with the original author, without whose invaluable input (and moral support) this project would never have gotten off the ground. To call me appreciative would be a massive understatement.

At times, I have found it necessary to add explanatory notes alongside Eskov's original footnotes. To prevent confusion, each set is marked with our respective initials; citations, however, remain unmarked.

Happy reading!

"Take care what you're doing, Afranius. After all, they're temple seals!"

"The procurator need not trouble himself about this question," replied Afranius, closing the packet.

"You mean you have all their seals?" asked Pilate, laughing.

"How could it be otherwise," replied Afranius dryly, with no trace of laughter.

— Mikhail Bulgakov
*The Master and Margarita*¹

Borges once remarked that "the generations of men, throughout recorded time, have always told and retold two stories—that of a lost ship which searches the Mediterranean seas for a dearly loved island, and that of a god who is crucified on Golgotha."² With regard to the latter, he was perhaps not entirely correct. The artistic and philosophical reinterpretation of the events surrounding the execution of Jesus Christ only became an established literary tradition in the 19th century, when the Church lost a significant portion of its function of ideological supervision. Within a narrative, this theme typically takes the form of a subplot or a "novel within a novel" (as in the works of Bulgakov and Aitmatov); more rarely, it may take the form of a standalone work (such as those of France and Andreyev).³ The texts that have been created within this tradition vary quite widely, both in their artistic level (from Bulgakov's immortal Master to Ilya Varshavsky's comic sci-fi story

¹ trans. Diana Burgin & Katherine Tiernan O'Connor, pp. 275-276

² "The Gospel According to Mark" from Dr. Brodie's Report, trans. Norman Thomas di Giovanni, p. 9.

³ The works Yeskov is referencing are The Master and Margarita by Mikhail Bulgakov, The Place of the Skull by Chingiz Aitmatov, "The Procurator of Judea" by Anatole France, and "On the Day of the Crucifixion" by Leonid Andreyev. (Z.B.)

“Hysteresis Loop”) and in the degree to which they conform to Holy Scripture and historical reality (from the pinpoint precision of Yury Dombrovsky to the deliberate inaccuracy of the Strugatsky brothers).⁴ With regard to the latter aspect, it is worth comparing two renowned cinematic masterpieces: The Gospel According to St. Matthew and The Last Temptation of Christ. It goes without saying that all these authors’ versions differ quite radically, to the point where the Gospel figures depicted in them are merely “homonyms” of each other—compare France’s Pilate with Bulgakov’s, Andreyev’s Judas with Dombrovsky’s, or Pasolini’s Jesus with Scorsese’s.

Nevertheless, there is still one fundamental constraint that all works produced within this tradition are subject to: supernatural forces may not directly interfere with the course of events other than to send “a strange cloud drifting into Yershalaim.”⁵ This is precisely why an event so crucial to the Christian worldview as the Bodily Resurrection is always omitted from these narratives—despite the fact that many of the authors who have turned to this theme were undoubtedly people of faith. And since I belong to a generation whose perceptions were shaped immeasurably more by Bulgakov’s Yeshua⁶ than by his official prototype, the problem of the Resurrection was one that did not interest me in the slightest up until very recently.

⁴ These works are, respectively, The Faculty of Useless Knowledge and Burdened with Evil. (Z.B.)

⁵ The Master and Margarita, p. 255. “Yershalaim” is the Russian transliteration of the Hebrew word “Yerushalayim,” meaning “Jerusalem.” (Z.B.)

⁶ Similarly to his use of the word “Yershalaim” (see note 6), Bulgakov refers to Jesus in The Master and Margarita by his Aramaic name, Yeshua Ha-Notsri. (Z.B.)

McDowell's Argument

Not long ago, however, I came across a book by famed contemporary evangelist Josh McDowell,⁷ in which he sets himself a most extraordinary task: to prove the fact of Christ's Bodily Resurrection from a purely rational perspective. McDowell's system of reasoning is as follows. Treating the Gospel as a historical document and drawing on a number of other (religiously neutral) sources, he meticulously sorts through all conceivable possibilities that might provide a materialist explanation for the extraordinary events following the execution of Jesus Christ (in particular, the disappearance of his body from a sealed tomb that was guarded by Roman soldiers). He classifies these hypotheses in the following manner:

I. Christ's tomb was not actually empty.

1. The actual location of Christ's burial was completely unknown; his body was most likely tossed into a ditch alongside those of the other executed criminals (Guignebert's hypothesis).⁸
2. Confusion with the tombs: the women who first discovered the "Resurrection" actually went to another person's unoccupied tomb by mistake (Lake's hypothesis).⁹
3. All stories of the Resurrection are legends that sprang up many years after Christ's execution, and have no basis in reality whatsoever.

⁷ The Resurrection Factor. San Bernardino, CA: Here's Life Publishers, 1981

⁸ I.e. French Historian Charles Guignebert. (Z.B.)

⁹ I.e. Harvard professor Kirsopp Lake. (Z.B.)

4. The story of the Resurrection is merely an allegory; what it describes is actually a purely spiritual resurrection.
5. All of Christ's appearances were the result of individual and collective hallucinations.

II. Christ's tomb actually was empty, but was made empty by natural means.

1. His body was stolen by his disciples.
2. His body was relocated and hidden by the authorities, with the goal of preventing any possible fraud on the part of those who were awaiting his resurrection.
3. Christ did not die on the cross; he was taken down from it in a state of shock, then later regained consciousness and recovered.
4. Hugh Schonfield's Passover Plot hypothesis: Jesus, believing that he was chosen by God, set out to create the appearance of fulfilling the prophecies concerning the Messiah. To this end, he organized his own crucifixion with the help of Joseph of Arimathea; to imitate death on the cross, he drank a narcotic substance instead of vinegar. According to the plan, he would then be brought into the tomb, from which he would emerge sometime later as the "resurrected" Christ. The plot failed when a soldier struck Christ with his spear and killed him for real. However, Mary and the disciples then went on to mistake another young man for Christ; Joseph, despite knowing the truth, never thought to inform them of their error.

After refuting all these hypotheses to varying degrees of persuasiveness, McDowell considers the range of logical possibilities to be exhausted and comes to a conclusion: it is impossible to explain the disappearance of Christ's body, as well as his subsequent appearances, from a materialist perspective. Ergo, we are presented with a case of the direct intervention of God in earthly affairs.

It should be noted that a completely identical system of proof for Christ's resurrection had already been laid out in 1906 in Boris Gladkov's Universally Accessible Interpretation of the Gospel, a book "intended for intelligent readers, especially nonbelievers, doubters, and vacillators."¹⁰ Likewise, he sequentially refutes "three possible objections to the reality of Christ's resurrection":

- 1) Jesus' disciples stole His body and announced that He had been resurrected; 2) Jesus did not die on the cross, but was entombed while in a death-like state, following which He revived and appeared to His disciples; 3) Jesus was not resurrected in reality, but only in the imagination of His disciples.

While, technically speaking, Gladkov's set of hypotheses is substantially smaller than McDowell's, it actually spans the entire range of fundamentally irreducible and mutually irreconcilable positions (as it would hardly be worth making a serious argument against, say, a theory as fantastical and riddled with inconsistencies as The Passover Plot).

I think any person familiar with the laws of logic can plainly see the fundamental flaw in either McDowell or Gladkov's system of proof (see below); I should emphasize that I am referring to such a system as a whole, and not to any refutations in particular. My interest was piqued all the more by the quotes that McDowell had cited from a number of leading Western jurists, including English High Court members Lord Darling and Lord Caldecote and Attorney ¹⁰ Universally Accessible Interpretation of the Gospel, annotation.

General of Great Britain Lord Lyndhurst. In short, their verdict is that the available evidence would be sufficient for the Resurrection to be recognized as fact in a hypothetical court case. Simon Greenleaf, longtime Royall Professor of Law at Harvard University and author of a classic three-volume treatise on evidence law, even published a monograph dedicated to the topic, The Testimony of the Evangelists, Examined by the Rules of Evidence Administered in Courts of Justice.

I'm well aware, of course, that most of my foggy Soviet notions of the Western legal system are derived from Erle Stanley Gardner's detective novels. But still... Just try to imagine Attorney Perry Mason (or Prosecutor Berger, for that matter) attempting to convince the jury that some incident or other had occurred as a result of supernatural forces—on the sole grounds that he himself could not offer a convincing explanation for what had happened. Were you able to do it? I'm trying right now—and I can't. My mind just won't let me...

As far as religion goes, I, like many of my colleagues in the natural sciences, am an agnostic; I have always held it as an axiom that within the sphere of Reason, there is no proof of God's existence, nor can there be. By rejecting Tertullian's honest "credo quia absurdum"¹¹ and desacralizing the text of the Gospels himself, the Protestant McDowell has knowingly entered a rather risky game on the opponent's field. Unable to resist the temptation, I have accepted his challenge; as a friend of mine used to say, "Don't try me! And if you do, don't blame me..."

¹¹ A Latin phrase meaning "I believe because it is absurd." (Z.B.)

Problem Statement

First, let us observe that the rigor of McDowell's system of proof is merely illusory. In terms of classical logic, it constitutes an indirect proof, whereby "the truth of a proposition is established by demonstrating the falsehood of the assumption to its contrary."¹² This method is not universal in and of itself, and there are a number of fundamental restrictions on its use. However, there is a more pressing issue here. In this case, the falsehood of the contrary assumption is not proved deductively, but is inferred as an inductive generalization, suggesting that this is actually a case of incomplete induction (a so-called "hasty generalization").

Moving from the logical aspect of our problem to the substantive aspect: it should be emphasized that McDowell's method of sequentially examining a list of alternatives is sound if, and only if, their combined whole exhaustively spans the entire range of logical possibilities (as McDowell in fact insists). Thus, in order to refute the "McDowell-Gladkov System," the following is necessary and sufficient: I must propose at least one other hypothesis (naturally, a materialist one) that would provide a more consistent explanation than the ones previously refuted for the events surrounding Christ's crucifixion and resurrection.¹³

Thus, our problem is identical to the one that is solved in any classical ("English") detective story, which is essentially like assembling a jigsaw puzzle. From a fixed number of pieces of a given shape (established facts), we need to construct a figure (alternate version) in such a way that the fragments fit together without gaps and every single one of them is used, even the most “inconvenient” ones. Just to be safe, let me reiterate: the only thing our version needs to be is internally consistent; the question of its truth or falsehood is one that lies in a different plane altogether, and is simply irrelevant in this context.

¹² A Brief Dictionary of Logic, Aleksandr Ivin, Dmitry Gorsky, & Aleksandr Nikiforov, p. 81.

¹³ I would like to note that in Damiano Damiani's outstanding film The Inquiry, the emperor Tiberius sends a "special investigator" out to Jerusalem who attempts to do more or less the same thing (without much success, however). (K.E.)

Stating the question in this way allows us to, among other things, avoid discussing the historicity of Christ, the validity of treating the canonical Gospels as historical documents, and other such issues. It would be ridiculous for an amateur to try entangling himself in the problems that all kinds of specialists—historians, archeologists, philologists, linguists—have written vast piles of literature on. Therefore, by no means should we look at the text through the lens of academic Biblical studies; the primary focus of our investigation will be on literary characters, not their historical prototypes (assuming they existed in the first place). I myself might define it as a continuation of the same tradition that produced one of my favorite books, The Riddle of Prometheus by Lajos Mesterházi.

For this reason, we will take the authorship and timeline of the writing of the Gospels to be in full accordance with church canon; the problem of the continuity of the four canonical texts with the Logia of Matthew, the Gospel of Thomas, and the proto-Gospel “Q” (from the German Quelle, “source”) will be of no concern to us. My outline of the events will mostly follow that of Frederic Farrar’s The Life of Christ, a classic account that consolidates all the New Testament texts into a single narrative and is written from a conventional Christian perspective.

There are a number of places, however, where the various Evangelists’ accounts seem to diverge quite fundamentally; in these cases, we cannot avoid discussing the source of these discrepancies. When approaching the accounts of Saints Matthew, Peter, Paul and John¹⁴ that form the basis of their respective Gospels, we can think of them as... say, the testimony of four lodgers at a snowed-in Yorkshire estate where, by the will of Agatha Christie, a mysterious crime has taken place. In cases where the interpretation of the texts, or the historical reality underlying them, is contentious or dubious, I think it would be fair to give preference to McDowell's opinion (if he has expressed one).

While we're busy setting out our starting conditions, let us introduce an important constraint. In the "materialist" hypotheses discussed by McDowell, Christ and his associates are presented as being, to put it bluntly, either morons or crooks. And even though I myself am indifferent to religion, and quite cold towards the official Churches, these are assumptions that I strongly dislike. At the end of the day, no matter what the Church Fathers might say, every person has their own Christ. And while, from the point of view of orthodox dogmatics, my Christ might be utterly monstrous (given that he bears all the "birthmarks" of liberal theology), under no circumstances is he a liar. In any case, both Christ and the majority of his companions would soon go on to give their lives for their beliefs, something which ought to command some basic respect for them in and of itself. Therefore, when sorting through hypotheses that might serve to explain the various "knots" of events, we will proceed from the following assumption: we may only assume conscious deception on the part of Christ and the Apostles after all other possible explanations have been exhausted (the "presumption of honesty"). Looking forward, I would like to note that such cases ultimately never occur—with just one caveat.

¹⁴ While this list may seem strange, there is a traditional belief that the Gospels of Mark and Luke were based on the testimony of Saint Peter and Saint Paul respectively. (Z.B.)

The English writer C.S. Lewis, a Christian philosopher and commentator, is primarily known in our country as an author of didactic children's literature. In one of his stories, a girl accidentally discovers a portal in an antique wardrobe that leads to a magical land. When her older brother and sister hear her stories of her visits, they begin to fear for their younger sister's sanity and ask their host, a professor, for advice:

"Logic!" said the Professor half to himself. "Why don't they teach logic at these schools? There are only three possibilities. Either your sister is telling lies, or she is mad, or she is telling the truth. You know she doesn't tell lies and it is obvious that she is not mad. For the moment then and unless any further evidence turns up, we must assume that she is telling the truth."¹⁵

It is odd that Lewis' professor completely overlooks at least one other possibility: the fact that an honest and sane person can become sincerely deluded. The causes of such delusions are quite diverse. They could be, for example, various natural phenomena, from optical effects in the atmosphere ("flying saucers") to systematic hallucinations caused by oxygen deprivation in high-altitude conditions (the "abominable snowman," the "Black Mountaineer").¹⁶ On the other hand, however—and this is more relevant to our case—any person can be the victim of a deliberate hoax.

What is significant here is that the perpetrator of a serious hoax not only needs to ensure that the staging itself is convincing, but also that it occurs in the presence of eyewitnesses whose reputation is nothing short of impeccable (as it would be useless to rely on the testimony of a fool or a known liar). There's a reason all kinds of specialists in telepathy and psychokinesis always want famous scientists to take part in their experiments, while categorically refusing to work their "miracles" in the presence of professional magicians. It is for precisely these reasons that our "presumption of honesty" does not mean that any fact reported by the Evangelists is necessarily true.

¹⁵ The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe, p. 52

¹⁶ The Black Mountaineer is a ghost reportedly seen by some Soviet mountain climbers; a figure dressed entirely in black, he supposedly died in a mountaineering accident and now roams the mountains for all eternity. (Z.B.)

Historical Background

Before we can proceed to a direct analysis of the Gospel texts (after which point we will not go beyond them), there are still some observations we need to make regarding the real-life historical context behind the events. In the year 6 CE, after the death of King Herod the Great, Palestine lost the last remnants of its independence and was occupied by the Romans; two of the four historical provinces of Palestine, Judea and Samaria, fell under the rule of Roman procurators who were directly appointed by the imperial administration. This resulted in the sudden rise of a national liberation movement; its ideology was largely shaped by religious fundamentalists known as the Pharisees, but the best-organized force within the movement was a group of radical nationalists known as the Zealots:

[The Zealots] agreed in all other things with the Pharisaic notions; but they had an inviolable attachment to liberty... They also did not value dying any kinds of death; nor indeed did they heed the deaths of their relations and friends: nor could any such fear make them call any man lord.¹⁷

It was the Zealots who played the decisive role in inciting the First Roman-Jewish War of 66 CE, which ultimately brought the Jews to complete national catastrophe.

Traditionally, traveling preachers played a large role in shaping public opinion in Palestine. Historians are aware of about a dozen prophets who were preaching at around the same time as Jesus Christ and John the Baptist, and were comparable to them in popularity; almost all of them were executed by the Romans as potential leaders of a Jewish revolt. Nevertheless, the years leading up to the Jewish War saw 12 such revolts (not counting minor insurrections and acts of terrorism). The Romans reacted to these events in their usual manner: according to Flavius Josephus, they once crucified 2,000 people simultaneously in Jerusalem.

¹⁷ Antiquities of the Jews, Flavius Josephus, Book XVIII, Chapter 1, trans. William Whiston

Balanced between these two irreconcilable forces was the local religio-political elite. While it initially grew out of a religious sect known as the Sadducees, it had completely dispensed with ideology by this point in time and was now a party of pragmatists. They were perfectly willing to collaborate with the Romans—or blood-sucking Martians, for that matter—to preserve the status quo; as soon as they got the chance, however, they would just as quickly paint themselves as the leaders of the national liberation movement (a trick the Communist partocracy of the former Soviet republics would later perform before our very eyes).

That actually happened, by the way. In Book II, Chapter 20 of The Jewish War, Josephus describes the election of the new, “revolutionary” administration of the uprisen Jerusalem; they resulted in “governorship of all affairs within the city” being handed over to... the unsinkable high priest Ananus. Here is the commentary of Yakov Chertok, Russian translator and publisher of The Jewish War, on this chapter:

Accordingly, the results of the election proved quite unfavorable for the Zealots, despite the fact that they had gained decisive dominance over both the capital and the provinces following their defeat of Cestius and their expulsion of the Romans from the borders of the country. [...] Eleazar ben Simon, victor over Cestius and subsequently the main leader of the war, was completely passed over in the election; the even more powerful leader of the Zealots at that time, Eleazar ben

Ananias, who gave the war its initial impetus [...], was given authority over the secondary province of Idumea, with the likely goal of sending him away from Jerusalem. The positions of greatest responsibility in Jerusalem and Galilee were granted to Roman allies who had previously gone into hiding to avoid the persecution of the Zealots [emphasis mine—K.E.].

Sounds familiar, don't you think?

These events came slightly later, though. In the time period we are concerned with, the Sadducee leadership found it more useful to demonstrate their loyalty to the "imperial center." The unpopular regime, as is usually the case, flooded the country with secret police agents. Elsewhere in Antiquities of the Jews, Josephus writes that from the time of Herod the Great (or rather, the Bloody), the torture, execution, and "disappearance" of dissidents became common practice:

And many there were who were brought to the citadel Hyrcania, both openly, and secretly; and were there put to death. And there were spies set everywhere, both in the city, and in the roads: who watched those that met together.¹⁸

In response, a militant faction of Zealots known as the Sicarii launched a campaign of terror against the occupiers and their local collaborators, the crowning achievement of which was their assassination of the high priest Jonathan. The Zealots had extensive clandestine networks at their disposal, and their agents permeated every part of the state apparatus. In addition, they were in frequent contact with bands of robbers (or "partisan detachments," if you will), which the country was quite literally swarming with. Some of these armed groups numbered up to several hundred men; the legendary field commander Eleazar, for example, terrorized the outskirts of Jerusalem for almost 20 years, outlasting several procurators and high priests.

¹⁸ Book XV, Chapter 10.

Likewise, there is no doubt that the Parthian Empire's intelligence services were also actively operating in Syria and Palestine; during this time, the Parthians were putting up a tough and rather effective resistance to the Roman Drang nach Osten.¹⁹ To be perfectly clear: I have yet to see any concrete evidence of foreign support of the Jewish national liberation movement. That being said, it is hard to imagine that such sophisticated politicians as the Parthians would have been unaware of the basic tactical principle, "the enemy of my enemy is my friend."

In short, the real Palestine was, to put it in modern-day spy lingo, "a country with a complex agent-operational situation," kind of like Lebanon or El Salvador in the 1980s. It lived up quite poorly to the idyllic picture painted of it by the Gospels: a land of shady olive groves where the people spend most of their time having edifying conversations and debating religion and philosophy.

I felt the need to go on this historical excursion for one reason, and one reason only. Whenever anybody (McDowell included), referring to Christ's Judea, casually writes that "the authorities did this" or "the authorities wanted that," that is pure nonsense. There were really two sets of authorities (as well as a clandestine, albeit quite powerful one), and their interests, while sometimes overlapping on certain issues, were completely different on the whole. To top it all off, the general instability of the situation clearly hindered these authorities' ability to maintain internal unity. In these conditions, the natural rivalry between groups, or the individuals within them, could take the form of open conflict, combined with the most unexpected and unnatural of temporary alliances ("Who are we going to be friends against today?").²⁰ In this regard, let us recall the state of affairs of the political leadership and intelligence services in Nazi Germany, which was so vividly reconstructed in the dearly beloved Soviet television series Seventeen Moments of Spring.

¹⁹ In his book The Craft of Intelligence, longtime CIA director Allen Dulles highlights the role that Parthian intelligence played in this "strategy of containment"; thanks in large part to the personal efforts of King Mithridates VI, it became one of the best intelligence agencies in the entire history of the ancient world. (K.E.)

Anyone who thinks this is purely conjecture should find Chertok's commentary on Chapter 13 of The Jewish War quite interesting:

The high priest Jonathan facilitated the appointment of Felix as procurator, as a result of which he incurred the wrath of the Sicarii. Meanwhile, however, Felix began to grow weary of Jonathan, who frequently reproached him for his cruel and unjust acts, and he wished to be rid of him. To that end, he came to an agreement with the Sicarii, who, despite being enemies of Felix, nevertheless offered him their services to assassinate the high priest whom they equally despised.

Biblical scholars have long highlighted a strange fact: even though Jesus spoke out just as sharply against the decadent Sadducee elite as he did against the dogmatist Pharisees, not once did he say a single word about the Zealots, whose activities were one of the most pressing issues of the day. Taking into account that the Zealots held the greatest power and authority in Jesus' native Galilee, the English biblical scholar S. G. F. Brandon argued in his monographs Jesus and the Zealots and The Trial of Jesus of Nazareth that Jesus, if not an outright member of the Zealot movement, was at the very least quite sympathetic to it.

²⁰ A common Russian phrase. (Z.B.)

In any case, at least one of the Apostles is reliably known to have been a Zealot: Simon (Lk 6:15). However, in his book The State in the New Testament, the German biblical scholar Oscar Cullmann provides evidence that four other Apostles were members of the Zealot movement: Peter, Judas, James the Great, and John. A telling detail: during the Last Supper, when Christ makes an allegorical plea for his Apostles to “sell their garments and buy [a sword],” they take him literally and reply, “Lord, look, here are two swords” (Lk 22:38).²¹ For what it’s worth, Judea wasn’t exactly Texas, and it was completely unheard of to carry weapons out in the open.

In terms of the problem before us, there is absolutely no need to dive into speculation as to what organizational ties Jesus might have had to the national liberation movement. What is important for us here is another aspect entirely. In times of social upheaval, any socially significant figure (a class to which Jesus certainly belonged—as did the other prophets of his time), regardless of what their own plans and desires may be, becomes a political figure. And that means they become either an independent actor, or an object of manipulation by outside forces.

²¹ Scripture taken from the New King James Version. Copyright © 1982 by Thomas Nelson. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

The Procurator of Judea

I think now would be a good time to turn to the problem of Pilate. From all that we know about him, it would seem that the “cruel procurator of Judea, the equestrian Pontius Pilate”²² was not so much incredibly cruel as he was absolutely heartless. So just what was it that twice compelled him to return to the case of a poor street preacher accused of crimen læse majestatis (insulting royalty) and, instead of having him immediately executed—just “for simplicity’s sake,” so to speak—do almost everything in his power to save him?

In an attempt to somehow explain Pilate’s strange affection for Christ, Matthew the Evangelist cites the intercession of the procurator’s wife, who supposedly had a relevant vision in a dream. Hold on—what wife is he talking about? Still, let’s suppose that the procurator really was married, and that he saw his wife’s opinions on state affairs as anything more than hot air. What was she doing in Jerusalem, then?

The problem is that the procurators of Judea maintained a permanent residence in the seaside city of Caesarea, and Pilate only came to Jerusalem several times a year to oversee the collection of taxes and preside over trials.²³ But perhaps she could have sent a messenger to her husband from their residence in Caesarea? Alas, that doesn’t work either; the trial took place in the morning, his wife said that she “suffered many things that day in a dream because of Him” (Mt 27:19), and the distance from Caesarea to Jerusalem is around 120 kilometers as the crow flies. And yet, this rumor (for it can be nothing but a rumor) about the role of Pilate’s wife in this affair, which Matthew faithfully reproduced in his Gospel, is actually quite important. Let’s keep it in the back of our minds for now.

²² The Master and Margarita, p. 335 (with slight alteration)

²³ “Pilate,” Bible Encyclopedia of Archimandrite Nicephorus, III:122

With regard to Bulgakov's stunning reconstruction, it suffers, in my opinion, from only one flaw: his Pilate is too human. Not in the sense of being "too humane," but of being too susceptible to normal human emotions: curiosity, affinity and hostility, loneliness, and of course, cowardice ("the most terrible vice,"²⁴ as the procurator himself admits). In this sense, Dombrovsky's Pilate, a high-ranking imperial apparatchik, seems far more true to life:

"Hence Pilate's initial hesitation. He simply didn't want to execute anyone for the benefit of the Jews. But there was a second consideration. Reasons of state this time. The fact of the matter was that Christ, or someone like him, suited Pilate's book very well. Surprised? It's quite simple really. He had thoroughly assimilated two aspects of Christ's teaching. In the first place, this wandering preacher did not believe either in war or revolutionary upheaval; no, man must refashion himself from within, and then everything would happen by itself. Therefore he was against rebellion. That was the first point. Second: the only thing Jesus that sought to destroy and actually was undermining all the time, were the authorities. The authority of the sanhedrin, the Sadducees and the Pharisees, and so, perhaps unwittingly, the authority of Moses and the temple. And it was in the monolithic and unquestionable nature of these that the greatest danger to the Empire resided. Clearly Rome needed precisely the sort of subversion that Jesus represented. [...] Now imagine the state of the world at that time and ask yourself whether or not such utterances in the mouth of the Galilean did not suit Pilate? Didn't it mean a prescription to pray for and love him, the occupier? Surely Pilate, a state official who knew the East and the land he was attempting to pacify, realized that this was the very force on which he ought to rely?”²⁵

²⁴ The Master and Margarita, p. 272.

I included such a lengthy quote simply because these generally surface-level considerations often paradoxically go unnoticed. It seems that whenever the relationship between the Roman authorities and early Christianity comes up, people immediately think back to the tar-covered human torches of Nero's reign, as well as other equally colorful incidents. Be that as it may, what we are talking about here is another time and another place, and politics, as Churchill once famously said, sometimes makes for strange bedfellows.

You can argue all you want against early Christianity's assessment as a peace-loving doctrine by citing verses such as “I did not come to bring peace, but a sword” (Mt 10:34) and other, equally noteworthy passages from Holy Scripture. The fact remains, however: thirty years later, members of the first Christian communities actually refrained from taking part in the Great Revolt and the Jewish War, for which their fellow countrymen branded them as Roman collaborators and exiled them to Transjordan. So if Pilate's attempts to save Jesus really were motivated by the aforementioned considerations of state, he was certainly right on the money. As for the long-term consequences, the procurator—honest to God!—had far more important things to worry about than someone else's future headache.

So that's why he tried to save Jesus. But why didn't he? Why, after stating his premise (be it for reasons of state, to spite his enemies in the Sanhedrin, or simply on a lordly whim), did he not follow through to its conclusion and use his vast range of powers to their fullest extent? The standard version—“he chickened out because the local muckamucks threatened to snitch on him to the Dear Leader”— doesn't sound even remotely convincing. By that time, they had burned all possible bridges with the local authorities; a report here, a report there, what difference could it make?

²⁵ The Faculty of Useless Knowledge, trans. Alan Myers, pp. 290-291.

Besides, an administrator as experienced as Pilate surely knew that such an accusation was never the actual reason for any punitive action; it could only ever be used as a formal pretext, if your fate was already sealed regardless. On the other hand, the procurator had already engaged in misconduct the moment he attempted to exonerate a "state criminal"; had this attempt been successful, that hardly would have mattered from the point of view of Tiberius' totalitarian regime (in the event they brought it to trial). Thus, so long as we assume that the driving force behind our Pilate's actions were serious considerations of state, we can look at his "about-face" in that light as well.

Now, let us turn our attention to a rather significant detail, which for some reason, commentators on the Bible always seem to miss (or intentionally ignore). It is common knowledge that Christian tradition has done all it can to vindicate Pilate (in the Coptic and the Ethiopian Churches, he has even been canonized), laying all the blame for Christ's tragic death on the Jews. Meanwhile, in the time between Pilate's two "not guilty" verdicts, another was rendered: that of Herod Antipas, the Tetrarch (King) of Galilee. This detail, when considered with respect to the traditional view, is nothing short of outrageous. Let me explain.

As the representative of the semi-legitimate Idumean Dynasty, it was Herod, not the Sanhedrin, whose interests were most greatly affected by the crime Jesus was charged with—pretending to the Judean throne ("Are you the King of the Jews?"). Nevertheless, the Sanhedrin stubbornly insisted that Jesus be executed, and Herod, just like Pilate, saw absolutely nothing criminal in his actions. And this was the very same Herod who could be accused of everything except the “idiotic disease of complacency”:²⁶ the platter with John the Baptist’s head is more than enough evidence of that.

And in fact, no ruler, being of sound mind and body, would willingly prevent the execution of a dubious prophet; either he is mad, or he is a rebel. As the khan in The Enchanted Prince tells his vizier in a similar situation:

“Once he has been seized and thrown into prison, why not cut his head off for safety’s sake? We see no reasonable cause for abstaining! Revolt is much more serious than those Peshawar sorceries of yours, it is no joking matter!”²⁷

The explanation Christian commentators give for this usually runs along the lines of, “Christ’s innocence was so obvious that even a man as cruel and debauched as Herod could not uphold the Sanhedrin’s verdict.”²⁸ However, that is nothing more than childish prattle; in such situations, one’s actual guilt or innocence means absolutely nothing. For Herod not to have subjected Jesus to the same Precautions discussed by the aforementioned khan, he must have been under some degree of pressure, the source of which is quite obvious. Thus, Pilate’s efforts to save Jesus must have been even more serious and sustained than the Gospel texts directly imply.

Herod’s position (whether it was arrived at independently or by force), which is typically ignored as an insignificant detail, actually changes the picture of the balance of power quite radically. The image of an austere, honest Roman official, alone in his opposition to the Jews and their unshakeable religious fanaticism, disappears.

²⁶ A phrase originating from one of Stalin’s decrees, in which he alleged that several (mostly Jewish) doctors had conspired to assassinate government officials by way of “negligence”; in context, it was used to lambaste the security services’ purported inability to thwart the conspiracy. (Z.B.)

²⁷ The Enchanted Prince, Leonid Solovyov, trans. Bernard Isaacs, p. 167.

²⁸ Universally Accessible Interpretation of the Gospel.

In its place appear two supreme authorities—one Roman, one Jewish—who find themselves pestered by the ridiculous claims of one of the Judean public bodies. I should point out that the Sanhedrin functioned as not a criminal, but a purely religious tribunal, and the case they brought before Pilate was not even remotely within their jurisdiction. The Sanhedrin had full right to declare Christ a blasphemer and a heretic posing as the Son of God, and on those grounds they could sentence him to stoning once they had submitted their—religious—verdict to the procurator for his purely formal approval.²⁹ Instead, with a persistence that remains completely incomprehensible, they slap the heretic Christ with trumped-up political charges and demand that Pilate crucify him as a political criminal—a pretender to the Judean throne. As a result, the Sanhedrin, who have lacked the requisite authority from the very beginning, have moreover taken a legally indefensible position in their opposition to the secular authorities (namely, Pilate and Herod). And yet, at the very moment when it seems his opponent has no cards left to play, not even the very worst one, Pilate suddenly and inexplicably capitulates. What’s the deal here?

The deal was that 23 relatively smart members of the Jewish clergy understood Christ’s teachings just as well as Pilate did, and realized the threat posed by the young prophet’s continued growth in popularity—both to the Temple of the Jewish faith and to them personally. And with that knowledge, they made a counterintuitive yet, as it turned out, perfectly calculated move: they arrested Jesus and came to Pilate with a blatantly illegal request—to execute him as a political criminal. This resulted in a magnificent “fork”: either their hated rival would be liquidated at the hands of the Romans (with time, he could even be canonized as yet another hero who died at the occupiers' hands), or the procurator would let him go free, thereby acknowledging that the notorious Christ was a Roman "agent of influence" and rendering the prophet a political corpse.

²⁹ It was to stoning, the method of execution imposed for crimes against the Faith, that the high priest Ananus went on to sentence James, brother of Jesus several years later—without even bothering to inform the Roman procurator (Antiquities of the Jews, Book XX, 9:1). (K.E.)

There are serious grounds to believe that the Sanhedrin found the second option far more desirable, and more likely. Recall that if the high priests' only goal was to have Christ's head, then it would have been far simpler to go with the foolproof option of rendering a religious verdict. In any case, Pilate's approval of the execution of the "King of the Jews" clearly took them by surprise—kind of like someone who theatrically asks for his dismissal, then actually gets it. Only pure bewilderment could explain their panicked request for a Roman guard to patrol the burial site—this, in a city chock full of temple guards!

...The procurator realized he had lost: it was useless to keep up the fight for Jesus. Of course, he could simply pardon the Galilean, stamping a big fat X on his viability as a political figure, but that would just be pure capitulation. Nonetheless, he could still try to derive some benefit from the death of the popular prophet (as a benefit in this case meant anything to the Sanhedrin's detriment). And so, after making a show of washing his hands, Pilate—entirely of his own accord!—hands Jesus over to the soldiers for torture, then demonstrates to the crowd: it is the Sanhedrin that is guilty. From this moment on, the Sanhedrin will be guilty of everything, down to the gall and sour wine Christ is given by Roman soldiers (Mt 27:34). I've got to hand it to him—despite being down a piece, Pilate ultimately won the initiative and, to some extent, managed to equalize the game. The persistence and ingenuity of this ruthless chessmaster are certainly worthy of respect, but as for what could have possibly led anyone to canonize him, I admit I haven't the slightest idea.

But still, was there really no way for Pilate to even theoretically save Jesus, without “outing” him? Yes, there was—and he didn’t hesitate to use it. “At the feast the governor was accustomed to releasing to the multitude one prisoner whom they wished” (Mt 27:15); so really, if the crowd in the square picked Jesus, the procurator could have released him without any problem, as there would be no sign of a “Roman trail.” But luck was not on his side; the crowd, of course, chose Barabbas—it would be strange if the high priests were careless and failed to ensure that the “voice of the people” was duly trained. However, this—completely natural—choice on the part of the Jews comes as a total surprise to Pilate. He repeats his request three times, entering into a pointless bickering match with the crowd that only leaves him further humiliated—in other words, he completely loses face.

So, the natural course of events has clearly caught the procurator off guard. From this, it is logical to assume that there was some factor unknown to us (but known to the procurator) that was supposed to interfere with the natural course of events. Supposed to, but didn’t. The “million dollar question”: what was this factor, and why didn’t it work out as planned?

Golgatha

(First Warning to McDowell)

At this point, we are forced to start off with a theoretical digression—of the sort I have been trying my best to avoid. The deep, fundamental discrepancies between John’s narrative on the one hand, and that of the Synoptic Evangelists on the other, are well-known (“How many gospels are there? Four? No: three and one”).³⁰ And Dmitry Merezhkovsky was probably right when he wrote that “the dispute concerning John is the greatest enigma of Christianity... perhaps the enigma of Christ Himself.”³¹ To me, however—an irreligious person in general, and a complete virgin when it comes to theology—the coexistence of these two fundamentally irreducible and mutually irreconcilable versions seems perfectly normal and natural.

Strange as it may sound, it is actually my profession that has trained me to have such a perception. For us in the natural sciences, you see, knowledge is fundamentally reductive. Thus, as a rule, the continued coexistence of alternative conceptions of a natural phenomenon indicates that they are in fact complementary, and simply “reduce” observable reality to different aspects of its nature. As I see it, then, the opposition between John and the Synoptists is fundamentally no different from, say, the relationship between the wave and particle theories of light, which describe the same object in different ways, and only give an adequate impression of it when taken together as a pair. Again, let me quote from Merezhkovsky’s apologia Jesus the Unknown (pp. 97-98):

³⁰ Dmitry Merezhkovsky, Jesus the Unknown, trans. H. Chrouschoff Matheson, p. 73. (Z.B.)

³¹ Jesus the Unknown, p. 92.

John divines correctly—better perhaps than the synoptics—what Jesus intended. What He did, we learn from Mark; what He said, from Matthew; what He felt, from Luke. But what He intended, we learn from John; and of course, it is what He intended that is of real, primary importance.³²

Now, that's all well and good on a general, conceptual level; in terms of the problem before us, though, where it is the specific details of the events that are important, the situation changes. We will frequently discover cases where John describes certain colorful incidents in detail that are completely absent from the Synoptists' narrative, and vice-versa—this is normal. In this sense, however, the scene at Golgotha is unique: here, the accounts of John and the Synoptists strike “tit for tat,” contradicting each other in literally every detail. And since my arguments are based on complete trust in the facts (though not necessarily their interpretations) reported by all four of the Evangelists, I find myself in a rather complex position, from which there is no clear way out.³³

The discrepancies begin with a typical “trifle.” John confidently testifies that Jesus, “bearing His cross, went out to a place called the Place of a Skull, which is called in Hebrew, Golgotha” (Jn 19:17).

³² Emphasis Merezkovsky's. (K.E.)

³³ However, one could still put forward the following hypothesis: the three Synoptic Gospels are genuine memoirs, whereas the Gospel of John was... let's say, a historical novel based on the others written many years later, in which truth and artistic license are melded into an inseparable whole. Furthermore, this second reality, owing to the genius (or Divine Inspiration, your choice) behind its creation, broke away, as one might expect, from its historical foundation and became entirely self-contained. I must admit that adopting such an assumption (which would allow me to disavow all of John's testimony) would make my life significantly easier. Alas! The starting conditions for the problem at hand (which include giving equal treatment to the four canonical texts) were defined quite strictly, and are not subject to review. (K.E.)

Meanwhile, the Synoptists unanimously claim that the Savior's cross was carried by a certain Simon of Cyrene, and even include completely verifiable biographical details about the man, calling him "the father of Alexander and Rufus" (Mt 27:32, Mk 15:21, Lk 23:26). This time, you can't take lofty refuge in the nature of the Logos at hand, and you can't get out of this one with a casuistry like "both of them are right, but each in their own way." You have to answer honestly: who got mixed up here?

I once heard the following, purely philological argument in support of the Gospels' authenticity as historical documents. It concerns a widely known episode:

And about the ninth hour Jesus cried out with a loud voice, saying, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?" that is, "My God, My God, why have You forsaken Me?" Some of those who stood there, when they heard that, said, "This Man is calling for Elijah!" Immediately one of them ran and took a sponge, filled it with sour wine and put it on a reed, and offered it to Him to drink. The rest said, "Let Him alone; let us see if Elijah will come to save Him." (Mt 27:46-49)

So (if I understand correctly), the use of unannotated direct speech to reveal the motivations of side characters only emerged as a literary device with the advent of the European psychological novel, in the 19th century; therefore, what we are dealing with is the stenographically accurate record of an eyewitness. Perhaps this is because I am not a philologist, but this sounds completely convincing to me. However, I should point out that the argument refers specifically to the Synoptists' narrative—dry as a report, and therefore especially sorrowful. It is in their account that a Man dies betrayed and abandoned by all those around him—a far cry from the figures of chromium-molybdenum steel who feature in Lives of the Saints.

In the Gospel of John, of course, these words are nowhere to be found. On the other hand, you find, for example, a quotation from Jewish scripture that Roman soldiers casually recite verbatim (Jn 19:24)—just in case the people around them fail to notice that they are not merely casting lots for a dead man’s clothes, but fulfilling an ancient prophecy? There is also the sublime conversation that a dying man, suffering the most terrible of agonies, carries on with the people standing at his cross: his mother and the “disciple whom he loved,” that is, John (Jn 19:26-27).³⁴ Wait a second! Among other things, the Synoptists have neither his mother nor his disciple there at all. The only ones there are the Galilean women who follow Christ everywhere—Mary Magdalene, Mary, mother of James, and Salome—and they are not standing anywhere near the cross, but are looking on from a distance (Mk 15:40, Mt 27:55). How could it be that all three Synoptists failed to notice such a “small detail” as John and the Virgin Mary standing at the cross? Especially since Ivan Bezdomny’s vision of Bald Mountain quite inaptly springs to mind: “and the mountain was encircled by a double cordon.”³⁵ Of course, you could hardly call that authoritative—and yet... I honestly admit that I have no idea what to do here—unless I adopt Merezhkovsky’s interpretation and come to the straightforward, yet depressing conclusion that the Savior merely wanted his mother and his beloved disciple at his cross...

³⁴ McDowell provides a detailed description of the medical aspects of crucifixion. It is often believed that death results from shock, combined with dehydration and heatstroke, but that is actually somewhat inaccurate. Several hours after crucifixion, a person starts to develop pulmonary edema due to the difficulty in breathing; the immediate cause of death is asphyxiation. Hence, a person undergoing crucifixion is incapable of holding an extended, coherent conversation as a matter of principle. (K.E.)

³⁵ The Master and Margarita, p. 143.

Where am I going with this? Well, taking on the role of counterintelligence agent Philip Rawlings, who “doesn’t believe anything he hears, and very little of what he sees,”³⁶ I just can’t help but wonder: was the man who was crucified between two robbers at noon on the fourteenth day of the spring month of Nisan³⁷ really the same man who, six days before, had entered Jerusalem to the cheers of “Hosanna”? If the conversation with his mother and disciple really took place the way John reported it, then yes, absolutely. But if nothing took place on Golgotha other than what the Synoptists so meticulously described, then I’m sorry, but just about anybody could have been hanging on the middle cross—perhaps a robber just like the two others, or perhaps a Zealot partisan.

One need only assume that, for their own benefit, the Roman authorities wanted to strengthen the position of Jesus’ sect, and that he made a deal with them (“the end justifies the means”)—and there would be practically nothing left unclear in the entire story of the Resurrection. This, incidentally, would explain the role of the episode where Jesus is dressed in a scarlet military cloak—after his trial, but before his scourging and his ascent of Golgotha (for example, Mk 15:17-20). After the scourging, they put Jesus’ clothes on another man—the man who was to take his place on the middle cross.

Personally, I don’t intend on defending this theory, or even seriously analyzing it, as that would force me to reject the “presumption of honesty” that I am obliged to uphold (in accordance with the starting conditions). But while I have the right to make such a “withdrawal,” McDowell does not. And considering that he took the time to craft a completely serious argument against the Passover

³⁶ Ernest Hemingway, The Fifth Column and Four Stories of the Spanish Civil War, p. 27

³⁷ This specific phrasing for the date of Jesus’ death is used several times throughout The Master and Margarita (e.g. p. 13, p. 255). (Z.B.)

Plot hypothesis, where not a single fact adds up, and Christ and Joseph of Arimathea cheat side-by-side like a pair of train station cardsharps, he is simply obliged to examine a hypothesis as patently obvious as the “Uncrucified Christ.”

At the same time, however, by no means do I wish to say that McDowell’s position on that issue would be indefensible. He could most likely cite the high priests who visited the execution site (Mt 27:41) or the conversation with the remorseful robber: “Assuredly, I say to you, today you will be with Me in Paradise” (Lk 23:43). In turn, an ardent supporter of this hypothesis could object that the face of the man on the cross was disfigured beyond all recognition in any case; that the high priests certainly did not come up close to the cross, and a person undergoing crucifixion (assuming it takes place not in a classical painting, but in real life) is forced to keep their face lowered to the ground; that the organizers of the hoax surely would have taken care to increase the physical resemblance of the people involved; that the conversation with the robber could not have been heard by anyone apart from the legionnaires, and their “testimony” is clearly worthless, etc. In short, both sides would have wide room to maneuver here.

However, the problem lies not in these particularities. Even if McDowell manages to provide a sufficiently convincing rebuttal of the “Uncrucified Christ” hypothesis, his position will not become any less unenviable. After all, his entire system of proof is based on the assumption that he has analyzed (and refuted) every possible materialist theory—and suddenly, a special case pops up... It just goes to show that the range of logical possibilities is fundamentally inexhaustible, and there’s nothing you can do about it.

In short, it seems that McDowell’s dreadnought has already struck a sea mine on its way out of the harbor. And while the crew’s efforts might keep the ship afloat, its use as a combat unit will be rather limited from here on out. However, there are even greater surprises in store for Captain McDowell on this voyage...

John the Baptist

Let us return now to the very beginning of Jesus Christ's public ministry, when fate brought him face-to-face with the last of the Old Testament prophets, John the Baptist. The Forerunner of the Savior ("He who is coming after me is mightier than I"—Mt 3:11), who considered himself "not worthy to loose His sandal strap" (Jn 1:27), John was the first to correctly recognize the divine essence of Jesus: "Behold! The Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world!" (Jn 1:29). A man who sharply rebuked both religious and secular leaders ("Brood of vipers! Who warned you to flee from the wrath to come?"—Mt 3:7), he paid with his life for his denunciation of the lawlessness and debauchery that Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee, was mired in. At first glance, this personage (whose historicity, incidentally, is without question) seems to have absolutely no mystery about him. However, let us conduct a careful and impartial analysis of John's relationships—first, with Jesus, and second, with the authorities (in particular, Herod Antipas).

The first (and last) meeting between Jesus and John took place on the banks of the River Jordan, in whose waters the prophet would baptize the crowds of people who flocked to him. Jesus, among others, asked to be baptized; John "would have prevented him, saying, 'I need to be baptized by You, and are You coming to me?'" (Mt 3:14). The moment the ritual was performed, the Holy Spirit descended upon Jesus in the form of a dove (visible only to the Baptist, however). The episode of the baptism is described practically identically by all four Evangelists, but afterwards, like usual, significant discrepancies begin to emerge between John and the Synoptists.

John the Evangelist writes that the next day, John the Baptist sent Jesus adetachment of two of his own novices—Andrew and another not mentioned by name—who became his first disciples. Later on, Jesus and his newly formed community returned to Galilee, where he performed his first miracles. Then, he went on his first Passover pilgrimage to Jerusalem; there, he expelled the money changers from the Temple for the first time, and also held a nighttime conversation with a member of the Sanhedrin named Nicodemus. After this:

Jesus and his disciples came into the land of Judea, and there He remained with them and baptized. Now John also was baptizing in Aenon near Salim, [...] for John had not yet been thrown into prison" (Jn 3:22-24).

Let's keep this last phrase in the back of our minds; it is very important.

Since by this point, more people were coming to Jesus to get baptized than to John, the latter's disciples voiced their resentment at the success of their "rival." John, however, admonished them for their jealousy, comparing Jesus to a bridegroom, and himself to the best man, who must not envy his friend, but feel happy for him ("He must increase, but I must decrease"—Jn 3:30). Following this, all references to John the Baptist in the Gospel of John disappear.

Now, let us return to the phrase "for John had not yet been thrown into prison." Given that it appears in the chronologically last of the four Gospels, it comes across as a direct objection to the Synoptists' version, and an attempt to remind them of how things really were. After all, if you believe the Synoptists, Jesus retreated into the desert immediately after his baptism to pray and overcome temptation; it was there that he learned of John's arrest (Mt 4:12, Mk 1:14). Only after he received this news did he travel to Galilee, and only there did he gain his first disciples, Andrew and Simon—fishermen on the Sea of Galilee. The importance of this seemingly insignificant detail—when precisely the Baptist was arrested—becomes clear from the subsequent narrative of the Synoptists

Matthew and Luke go on to recount the so-called “Embassy from John the Baptist”; after hearing of the miracles Jesus has performed, the prophet sends two of his disciples to him to investigate:

“Are You the Coming One, or do we look for another?” Jesus answered and said to them, “Go and tell John the things which you hear and see: The blind see and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed and the deaf hear; the dead are raised up and the poor have the gospel preached to them.” (Mt 11:3-5)

After John’s disciples depart, Jesus delivers a panegyric in honor of his Forerunner:

“Assuredly, I say to you, among those born of women there has not risen one greater than John the Baptist. [...] And if you are willing to receive it, he is Elijah who is to come” (Mt 11:11-14).

When you really think about it, this episode contradicts the entirety of the narrative preceding it. It’s bad enough that the Forerunner is continuing his ministry alongside the Lamb of God, who has already come into this world. That aside: if you have any grounds to believe that the Messiah has arrived, then surely your first instinct would be to go see him yourself, and not send your disciples to check things out. However, the Synoptists already have this question covered: the only reason John the Baptist didn’t come in person was because he was in prison at the time (Mt 11:2), having been arrested almost immediately after Jesus’ baptism.

But then John snaps back: nothing of the sort—the Baptist was still a free man for quite some time afterwards, and was performing baptisms side-by-side with Jesus. It seems the Evangelist understood the true meaning of this episode far better than the Synoptists did, for which reason he deliberately excluded it from his narrative—as this episode makes it abundantly clear that even in the best case scenario, the Forerunner had his doubts as to whether Jesus really was He who would “baptize with the Holy Spirit and fire” (Lk 3:16). What’s more, the Synoptists are completely silent as to how John reacted to his ambassadors’ report. If that’s the case, then what to make of everything John said upon meeting him personally (“Lamb of God,” “you come to be baptized by me?”), or the sign given directly to John in the form of a dove? Incidentally, I should point out that the entire scene of the baptism (as well as John’s subsequent “exhortation on Christ”—Jn 3:22-36) is what is known in legal terms as “hearsay,” as none of the Evangelists were personally there to witness it.

If you objectively analyze everything John said (and even more so, did), you inevitably arrive at a discouraging conclusion: at no point did the Forerunner clearly and unequivocally recognize his distant relative (according to Luke) as He who “would come after him more powerful than he.” Several of the Baptist’s statements regarding Jesus (for example, “and no one receives His testimony”—Jn 3:32) have forced Christian commentators to resort to plaintive explanations such as, “The Evangelist didn’t quite accurately convey the prophet’s meaning...” If we so desired, we could easily read some episodes differently from the way they are typically interpreted.

Take, for example, how Gladkov describes the scene of the baptism:

Recognizing that John had been sent by God to baptize, Jesus, a Man who had heretofore fulfilled all the Lord’s commandments, began His ministry by fulfilling the last Old Testament commandment, which God had just announced through John. As He was without sin, He had no need to repent, for which reason he petitioned John directly to baptize Him [emphasis mine—K.E.]. John saw at once that this was no ordinary man standing before him, and thus replied: “I need to be baptized by you, and do you come to me?”

Now here’s how I imagine this scene might have played out. Before this supremely authoritative prophet, who fills the Pharisees and Sadducees with awe and regularly sermonizes to enormous crowds of people, appears a young man who no one has ever seen before. He announces that since he is without sin, the only thing he needs from him is to be baptized. John, utterly astonished at such (from his perspective) insolence, throws up his hands with feigned humility. “Guess you’re right, buddy, you’ve come to the wrong guy. You know what, I shouldn’t be the one baptizing you—you should be the one baptizing me!” The audience is delighted—he sure showed him!

Christian commentators often claim that John himself directed his crowds of followers to Jesus; however, this is completely unsupported by the Gospel texts. It’s possible some members of John’s community actually did leave him for Jesus (Christ would go on to see many of his disciples leave him as well—a common occurrence), but this migration was clearly neither organized nor widespread. John the Evangelist’s account of the Baptist “gifting” Jesus his first disciples, as we may recall, is unanimously contradicted by the Synoptists. A rather telling detail: after John’s execution, his disciples made a special trip to tell Christ the news (Mt 14:12), but not one of them ended up joining his community!

The desire of John’s disciples to stick by their teacher’s side, especially during the trying times of his imprisonment, deserves nothing but respect. But then came John’s demise; it would seem only natural for them to start following the man who their dearly beloved teacher (as the Evangelists tell us) deemed himself the forerunner to. Yet nothing of the sort ever happened. In fact, the Johannites maintain a separate identity from Christians to this very day, existing in the form of a Jewish sect; they have a “Sacred Scripture” of their own where John the Baptist is recognized as the Messiah, while Jesus is taken to be a false prophet. And when you really think about it, this is all perfectly natural. How do you think John—a somber, puritanical Jew—would take to a man who miraculously turned water into wine for partygoers and rubbed shoulders with prostitutes, tax collectors, and occasionally—perish the thought!—uncircumcised gentiles?

And so, we observe a rather pronounced asymmetry in opinion: for Christians, John is their greatest prophet and a highly revered figure in general, whereas for the Johannites, Jesus is a false messiah. In addition, there are no grounds to believe that each of these sects formed their opinions in spite of the statements of their founders. For this reason, the Evangelists were faced with an intractable problem when it came time to describe these events. On the one hand, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, whose every word is Truth incarnate, had a very high opinion of John the Baptist (something they witnessed directly); on the other hand, said John, as far as they knew, did not return his feelings and was not particularly fond of their teacher. How could they possibly resolve such a contradiction?

Here’s how: by taking the many statements of John the Baptist (both authentic ones and those attributed to him by rumor) and selecting only those that could point to him recognizing the divinity of the Evangelists’ teacher. The lack of written texts made this task significantly easier. More likely than not, many of the statements attributed to John probably originated among Jesus’ followers themselves. After circulating among the population at large (and gathering new “details” along the way), these stories later returned to the Evangelists, who gladly recorded them as “independent testimony”—a well-known effect in sociology. The “beloved disciple”—the author of the fourth gospel, John—went further down this path than the others did. Not only did he introduce the apocryphal episodes of Christ being “gifted” his first disciples and the “exhortation on Christ” (neither of which appear in the Synoptic Gospels), he also omitted such obvious kompromat as the mention of his teacher’s “inspection” by the Baptist’s disciples (which, on the contrary, he was certainly a witness to—along with the other Apostles).

So were the Evangelists deliberately trying to bolster their teacher’s reputation by invoking the opinion of an authoritative independent source—modifying the latter’s actual statements in order to suit their needs? No, no, and no! Any believer knows full well that Christ’s authority—in the eyes of the Apostles—needed no “independent testimony” whatsoever to support it. For this reason, I am absolutely convinced that the Evangelists’ correction of the Baptist’s statements was a genuine attempt to save his authority—the authority of a man who, for some reason, hesitated to recognize the patently obvious fact that Jesus was the Messiah. And needless to say, the Evangelists’ efforts paid off; they literally created the John the Baptist who lives in our consciousness to this very day. The actual John, as I strongly suspect, would have justly occupied a place, if not alongside the Pharisees and other “Jewish elders,” then in any case very far away from the Son of Man.

Moving on to an analysis of John the Baptist’s relationship with the secular authorities, we need to make one caveat. The Evangelists only knew the details of the prophet’s tragic death through hearsay, just like any other citizen of Palestine who wasn’t one of Herod’s courtiers or a member of his secret police force. For this reason, the testimony of the New Testament texts will not be given any inherent precedence over that of Josephus’ Antiquities. Let us recall that Antiquities is the only non-Christian source that directly mentions such figures from the Gospel as John the Baptist and James, the brother of Jesus. As a result, the Church treats Josephus' testimony with a high degree of reverence; in particular, it is from this source that the Baptist's place of captivity, the fortress of Machaerus,³⁸ is taken.

Mark the Evangelist (Mk 6:17-29) describes the prophet's death as follows. John, in spite of his imprisonment, continued to maintain his influence over Herod:

Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just and holy man, and he protected him. And when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly.

The prophet, among other things, kept insisting that the tetrarch break off his relationship with Herodias, whom he married after divorcing his previous wife (the daughter of the Arab king Aretas IV) and dissolving the marriage of his brother Philip:

Because John had said to Herod, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife." Therefore Herodias held it against him and wanted to kill him, but she could not.

The opportunity presented itself at a feast, when Herodias' daughter Salome left Herod so stunned by her dancing that he quite simply went insane:

He also swore to her, "Whatever you ask me, I will give you, up to half my kingdom."

Uninterested in half of his kingdom, the princess, at her demonic mother's instigation, asked the king for the head of his irksome reproacher:

³⁸ "John the Baptist," Bible Encyclopedia, II:91-92.

And the king was exceedingly sorry; yet, because of the oaths and because of those who sat with him, he did not want to refuse her.

One of his henchmen was dispatched to the prison, and several minutes later, he presented the bloodthirsty beauties a platter with the prophet's severed head. And small wonder: woman, of course, is the root of all evil, and truly is she said to be "the devil's gateway"³⁹ (and if you have any doubts, take another look at Oscar Wilde's Salome).

Josephus, meanwhile, tells a different, far more prosaic story:

Now when [many] others came in crowds about [John]; for they were very greatly moved [or pleased] by hearing his words; Herod, who feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it into his power and inclination to raise rebellion... thought it best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause; and not bring himself into difficulties by sparing a man who might make him repent of it when it would be too late. Accordingly he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod's suspicious temper, to Macherus; the castle I before mentioned; and was there put to death. Now the Jews had an opinion, that the destruction of this army [in the war with Aretas] was sent as a punishment upon Herod; and a mark of God's displeasure to him.⁴⁰

So, there were no personal motivations at work here—it was politics all the way down. In comparing these two versions, let us first turn to the factual side of the matter—specifically, everything we know about the marriage of Herod Antipas and Herodias.

³⁹ Tertullian, On the Apparel of Women, trans. Sydney Thelwall, Book 1, Chapter 1.

⁴⁰ Antiquities of the Jews, Book XVIII, Chapter 5.

First, what was the nature of Herod's previous, dissolved marriage? Let's give the floor to Metropolitan Joseph, commentator on Antiquities:

With his tetrarchy sharing a border with such longtime predators as the Arabs, Antipas greatly facilitated the security of his subjects by building new military fortifications in the outskirts of the country. And not for nothing is his very marriage to the daughter of the Arabian king Aretas suspected to have been an act of pure political calculation, which would serve to ensure peace for his country better than any fortresses or weaponry could, assuming the marriage was not imposed upon him by Augustus.⁴¹

The dissolution of this forced, dynastic marital union—at his wife's initiative, no less—resulted in Herod's ill-fated border war with Aretas, but that's a whole other story.

Second, Herodias was previously the wife of Herod's stepbrother, not his biological one (as is commonly thought); the aforementioned Metropolitan Joseph provides ample evidence for this fact. It's not at all surprising that Josephus' account presents this as a completely ordinary story of a second marriage; in general, the Jews saw marriage not as a sacrament, but as a civil status, so divorce was an extremely common occurrence. I should note that Josephus himself was a member of the Pharisees, who were renowned for their expert knowledge in Mosaic Law; moreover, he had no warm feelings for the hellenized Herod. You would think that he, out of all people, would waste no opportunity to take yet another dig at the worthy offspring of Herod the Bloody—assuming there was anything even remotely criminal about the affair.

⁴¹ The History of the Jewish People According to Flavius Josephus' Antiquities, book III, chapter VII.

Third, Herodias has always been seen as a calculating seductress, who not only broke all laws of marriage just to wrap the king of Galilee around her finger, but then, toying with an ax, kept a watchful eye on her cozy perch by the throne. And again, that doesn't track. Several years later, the emperor Caligula ordered, so to speak, the "dismissal of Mr. Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, from his present position due to his inability to fulfill his duty," and exiled him to Spain, where he ultimately died—in poverty, obscurity, and total isolation. The only person who shared his exile with him, up until his dying day, was Herodias. It makes me wonder: would a woman like that really care what some scruffy, unwashed puritan was shouting about her "family values"?

And now, the actual episode of John's beheading. Let's start off with a seemingly basic question: where did it take place? Well, the king is celebrating his birthday with his courtiers, military commanders, and elders; in light of the absence of any specific indications in the text, it would be logical to assume that the feast was held at its typical location—Herod's palace at Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee. But during that time, John was held captive at the fortress of Machaerus (or Macheron), which is on the Dead Sea—and this comes from the same testimony by Josephus that the Church takes as fact! It should be noted that the Evangelists' account states that Herod did not merely give the order to execute John the Baptist (for which purpose he could have sent messengers from Tiberias to Machaerus, about 60 kilometers as the crow flies); no, right then and there, after several minutes had passed, he presented his stepdaughter the platter with the prophet's severed head.

In trying to resolve this obvious contradiction, some Christian commentators have tried—completely arbitrarily—to move the scene's location to Machaerus (if the mountain won't come to Muhammad, then Muhammad must go to the mountain). Gladkov, for example, goes so far as to tie this to political events:

Insulted [due to his daughter's divorce—K.E.], Aretas started a war against Herod; as a consequence of this, Herod and his entire court moved to Machaerus, where he had imprisoned John the Baptist, and took up residency in his palace there.

Well, let's start with the fact that Macherus was a small border outpost in the outskirts of the Arabian desert, and needless to say, there were no palaces there to speak of. Only recently, at the start of the protracted border war between Herod and Aretas, had the Jews captured the fortress from the Arabs, who had controlled it in previous years. Pretty strange idea to go to a place like that for your birthday, don't you think? Not to mention—what king brings his entire court, including his wife and children, out to an active war zone?

Or consider this detail: after Herod's ill-advised promise, Salome "went out and said to her mother, 'What shall I ask?' And she said, 'The head of John the Baptist!' Immediately she came in with haste to the king and asked, saying, 'I want you to give me at once the head of John the Baptist on a platter'" (Mk 6:24-25). Well, I'll be... I guess the princess put on a striptease for her stepfather's drunken guests just for the hell of it, with no concrete goal in mind beforehand?

For these reasons, I cannot help but be extremely skeptical of the Evangelists' version of the events. From an artistic perspective, though, the story is truly magnificent. It manages to organically combine obvious folklore elements ("Even if you ask for half my kingdom!") with a tightly structured plot—and just by itself, the semantic hieroglyph of the "head on a platter" provides ample fodder for pretentious art critics and psychoanalysts! Of course, to preserve the dynamism of the action (the immediate fulfillment of Herod's rash promise), it was necessary to sacrifice some degree of accuracy and move John to Tiberias (or alternatively, Herod to Machaerus), but such a sacrifice seems fully justified. It seems highly improbable that such a plot could spontaneously “clump together” from the various rumors circulating about the death of the popular prophet.

All of this allows me to make the following conjecture: this rumor about the circumstances of John the Baptist’s demise, which the Evangelists Mark and Matthew faithfully reproduced in their respective Gospels, was the result of an “active measures” campaign.⁴² Its goal seems quite obvious: to shift a significant portion of the blame away from Herod (who supposedly “did many things when he heard John, and heard him gladly”), depicting the tetrarch as the naive victim of perennial feminine guile. Who, then, was the initiator of this (judging from its result) exceptionally competent campaign to shape the public opinion of Palestine?

The answer, as I see it, will emerge of its own accord when we can successfully answer another question, closely tied to the first: who arrested John the Baptist? Right now, the reader is probably looking at me like I’m a total idiot—after all, the Evangelists and Josephus seem to be in complete agreement on this point. So let me refine the question a little: let’s suppose it really was Herod who executed John. But who carried out the arrest, and on what grounds? The Gospel texts lack any concrete indications in this regard; what’s more, the situation here is nowhere near as simple as it first appears, and here’s why.

⁴² A contemporary term referring to the practice of influencing public opinion through channels of official propaganda. A classical example of “active measures” is described in Leonid Solovyov’s The Tale of Hodja Nasreddin, where undercover guards in teahouses and caravanserais try to convince the people of Bukhara that their beloved Hodja has been a longtime servant of the emir. A more recent example is the use of KGB-controlled newspapers (mainly in third-world countries) to disseminate stories claiming that the AIDS virus was created in a Pentagon laboratory (see KGB: The Inside Story of Its Foreign Operations from Lenin to Gorbachev by Christopher Andrew and Oleg Gordievsky, pp. 529-530). (K.E.)

The problem is that John was a native of Judea, and lived there his whole life. He led an ascetic existence preaching in the Judean desert and the Jordan River Valley near Bethabara and Aenon. At times, he would travel to the left bank of the Jordan in Perea, but by all accounts, he never spent any time in Galilee. Therefore, John's preaching should really have only been a headache for the Judean high priests and procurator—not Herod. Moreover, the Judean leadership was actually quite sympathetic to the prophet (at least in the beginning), and many Pharisees and Sadducees even sought to be baptized by him (Mt 3:7).

Furthermore, if the tetrarch of Galilee wanted to get his hands on the scandalous preacher, it wouldn't be too easy to do; Judea was in at least some sense a foreign country, and the relationship between the Judean and Galilean authorities left much to be desired. But perhaps John, for reasons unknown to us, left Herod so upset by his preaching that he decided to thumb his nose at both the law and common courtesy, and send an arrest team into foreign territory?⁴³

While we can't rule out this possibility, it would render Christ's reaction to this event utterly incomprehensible, considering that he was also in Judea at the time: "Now when Jesus heard that John had been put in prison, He departed to Galilee" (Mt 4:12).

So, let's try to sum up everything we've established so far. First, a rather popular and influential spiritual leader was preaching in Palestine at the same time as Jesus Christ. Second, his relationship to the Son of Man was apparently not as idyllic as is commonly believed. Third, the death of said leader took place in highly unclear circumstances, the nature of which I suggest we ought to reflect on.

⁴³ Anyone who believes that the extraterritorial "actions" of the NKVD, whose victims included Alexander Kutepov, Leon Trotsky, and countless other Russian emigres, were an unprecedented event in world history, is sorely mistaken. The secret services of civilized and democratic France, for example, took great pleasure in kidnapping and killing OAS agents who had fled across the border, paying no heed to the protests of their neighbors—carrying on a proud tradition that started with the abduction of the Duke of Enghien by Napoleon's gendarmes. (K.E.)

The Raising of Lazarus

Now let's turn our focus to the event that immediately preceded Holy Week and, in a certain sense, served as the start of the tragedy—namely, the Raising of Lazarus. It was following this event that the high priests realized that the popularity of this new prophet and miracle worker had risen to dangerous levels, and it was time to take serious action. And it was at that moment that fate, as if on cue, sent them a priceless gift, the defector Judas; life abounds with such coincidences...

Of all the miracles performed by Christ, the Raising of Lazarus really does stand alone. Non-traditional commentators on the Gospel have quite rightly observed that almost all the people Christ healed were suffering from psychological or psychosomatic disorders. These included various types of paralysis and blindness, epilepsy, and (in the case of Jairus' daughter) lethargic sleep; in the case of the lepers, they might actually have been suffering from severe, untreated eczema. It is a well-known fact that such disorders can actually be cured by the power of suggestion. Jesus' outstanding talent for suggestion is clearly demonstrated by another set of miracles, such as feeding a crowd with five loaves of bread and two fish, turning water into wine, or walking on water, all of which can easily be interpreted as cases of mass hypnosis. For obvious reasons, however, the Raising of Lazarus—a man who had died several days earlier, had already been entombed, and was ostensibly starting to decompose—defies all possible explanation from a materialist standpoint.

Now of course, we could still “stick to our guns” here and come up with a pseudo-materialist hypothesis to explain this. There are many documented cases of people being “revived” after spending an extended amount of time in a state of “quasi-death” (where a person's metabolic rate falls to an imperceptible level, and they lack any visible signs of life, such as a pulse). First are Indian yogis, who are able to enter and exit such a state at will, as well as spend several hours underwater, or more than a day under a layer of earth. Second are the more interesting (from our case's perspective) zombies,⁴⁴ who are temporarily put into such a state by a sorcerer; he then passes them off to his fellow tribesmen as corpses that have been "revived" by the power of his magic. In recent years, physiologists have vastly improved their understanding of the mechanisms of "quasi-death"; it has been established, for example, that the function of a "stopped" heart is actually taken over by the hepatic portal system, which has its own contractile automatism.

However, all of this is besides the point; the last thing I want to do is write a screenplay for a hair-raising thriller with the working title A Zombie Named Lazarus. First, casting the Savior in the role of a voodoo sorcerer is only possible if I dispense with my obligatory "presumption of honesty." Second, let's not forget that the technique of putting someone into a "zombie state," an extremely complicated process with several centuries' worth of tradition behind it, was apparently unknown to the ancient Jews. Furthermore, there is no evidence that such a technique was practiced by any of their neighbors—Chaldean mages and pagan priests from Phoenicia and Egypt—who Jesus could have conceivably learned it from. Besides, one could hardly imagine that such an awe-inspiring practice would not have been duly reflected in the vast pile of historical literature concerning that region.

⁴⁴ In recent years, American journalists have come to use the word "zombie" in a looser sense, to describe people who have intentionally been subjected to mind-altering substances, hypnosis, and so on, with the goal of manipulating their behavior. Widely-known examples of this include the experiments conducted as part of the CIA research programs ARTICHOKE and MKUltra, which became the subject of a Senate investigation. Here, however, we are using the term "zombie" in the original sense of the word—the same way it is used in black voodoo cults in West Africa and the Antilles. (K.E.)

As for the Raising of Lazarus, let us first note that it appears solely in the Gospel of John; all three of the Synoptic Evangelists fail to mention this event entirely. This is so unusual that Farrar, for instance, deems it necessary to specifically comment on this discrepancy, offering three possible explanations for it; let's examine them one-by-one.

1. In general, the Synoptists' narrative chiefly concerns the Galilean portion of Christ's ministry, while the Judean portion (to which the events in Bethany belong) is described in far less detail; in John's case, the reverse is true. I find this explanation quite strange, since there are several (far less significant) episodes in the Synoptic Gospels that take place during Christ's stay at the house of Lazarus, Mary, and Martha.
2. The Synoptists might have considered this resurrection to be no more significant than any of the miracles they had previously witnessed. I mean, it's possible one of them might have thought, "Raising a rotting corpse from the dead? Big whoop!" But all three of them? Not a chance...
3. Farrar calls attention to the Synoptists' "special reticence about the family at Bethany;"⁴⁵ they call it "the house of Simon the Leper" (while John doesn't mention any lepers at all), and they call Mary merely "a woman," without any clarification. He conjectures that when the Synoptic Gospels (the earliest chronologically) were written, there was still some danger that the Judean authorities might liquidate Lazarus and the other witnesses to his resurrection (Jn 12:9-11). Under these circumstances, it was clearly far too risky to give the Sanhedrin's investigators any information about the family at Bethany. By the time John wrote his Gospel, however, he no longer had any reason to "keep his mouth shut," and he could finally recount the miracle. Sounds logical, right? The way I see it, not really. Just as a reminder, how did this resurrection end? "Then many of the Jews who had come and seen his signs said, 'Surely this man is the Prophet!' Others said, 'He is the Prophet!' But others said, 'He is the Prophet!'" (Jn 12:10-11). Sounds like a pretty clear case of a conspiracy to smear the reputation of the Savior. Jews who had come to Mary, and had seen the things Jesus did, believed in Him. But some of them went away to the Pharisees and told them the things Jesus did" (Jn 11:45-46). And rightly so; the very first thing you do in such a situation, after all, is tell the authorities—and somewhere down the line, they'll sort things out... So I'm going to go out on a limb and assume that, even if they wanted to, there was nothing the Apostles could have told the authorities about the family at Bethany that they didn't already know.

⁴⁵ The Life of Christ, p. 320.

So, none of Farrar's theories sound convincing to me at all. On the other hand, however, I see two other possible explanations for these discrepancies that we can choose from.

1. The episode of Lazarus' resurrection, which appears in the chronologically last of the four Gospels, simply had no basis in actual events. We will refrain from adopting this explanation due to the "presumption of honesty."
2. The Synoptists kept silent because, unlike John, they were convinced that something was fishy about this resurrection, and saw no reason to pay it any further mind. In this regard, it feels appropriate to cite the theory of New Testament commentator Ernest Renan. He believed that the Raising of Lazarus was “an intrigue of the sisters at Bethany,” Mary and Martha:

Mortified at the ill reception which their adored friend had met with in Jerusalem, his worshippers at Bethany attempted to do something which might give a new impulse to his cause in the unbelieving city. That, they thought, must be a miracle, if possible the raising of a dead man, and above all a man well known in Jerusalem. Now during Jesus’ absence in Peraea, Lazarus is taken ill. The sisters, becoming alarmed, send for their absent friend. But before he arrives, the brother has become better; and now an excellent idea occurs to them. Lazarus, still pale from the effects of his illness, permits himself to be put into a winding-sheet like a dead body and shut up in the family tomb.⁴⁶

After Jesus was brought to the tomb, he asked to see his friend; the stone sealing the entrance was rolled aside, Lazarus walked out, and everyone came to believe in the “miracle.”

Did Christ know about this? Renan supposes that, just like Francis of Assisi, for example, he was simply unable to control the “thirst for miracles” that had gripped his followers. As for the Apostles, however, this obvious piece of trickery, despite having the very best of intentions, only served to leave them outraged (recall one of the labels the Synoptists gave the family at Bethany—the “house of the leper”); nevertheless, they found it impossible to air any dirty laundry on the part of Christ’s followers.

⁴⁶ David Friedrich Strauss, The New Life of Jesus for the People, v. 2, p. 234.

But why didn't John see through this hoax? Without a doubt, the answer to this question lies in this Apostle's very personality. The man who wrote the Book of Revelation in his early thirties clearly had to be somewhat "out of this world" (and I don't mean that as a euphemism for "out of his mind"). What was patently obvious to someone like Peter or Matthew, whose feet were planted more firmly to this sinful earth, did not at all come off that way to John. In the surreal world he created and inhabited, miracles like the Raising of Lazarus were in fact quite normal and natural.

Returning to our "general line of inquiry," let us highlight two very important details regarding Christ's stay at Bethany. First, the Apostles and their teacher visited the home of Mary and Martha time and time again—both before and after the Raising of Lazarus. Second, it was from this house, after the Anointing of Jesus, that Judas went to the Sanhedrin. Let us now turn our focus to this man, perhaps the most mysterious figure of them all.

Judas

So, Judas from the town of Kerioth. The only Judean among 12 Galileans. The relationship between these two Palestinian peoples was not a particularly warm one; this is often cited as an explanation for the less-than-enthusiastic reception the Galilean Jesus enjoyed in Judea and its capital, Jerusalem (“Are you also from Galilee? Search and look, for no prophet has arisen out of Galilee”—Jn 7:52). However, this state of affairs did not stop Judas, a relative latecomer to Christ’s sect (if not one of his last followers), from being chosen as one of his 12 Apostles and even becoming their treasurer. This alone is a testament to the level of trust and authority that he enjoyed among Christ’s community of believers. And for what it’s worth, Jesus doesn’t give me the impression of being a holy fool, unable to put two and two together when it comes to worldly matters; on the contrary, he seems quite discerning when it comes to people, not unlike Tsar Fyodor Ioannovich⁴⁷ (or, for that matter, Bulgakov’s Yeshua).

For good reason, many people have been left unconvinced by the canonical narrative of Judas’ “betrayal for thirty pieces of silver,” and have sought other explanations for his actions; in this sense, he has certainly become the most popular figure from the Gospel. The alternative explanations that have been proposed vary incredibly widely: they include seething resentment at Christ the “deceiver,” whose kingdom, as it suddenly turned out, would not be of this world; a wish to see if the man who claimed to be the Messiah could even save himself; and a desire to hasten the establishment of the Kingdom of God on Earth (or perhaps provoke a popular uprising).

⁴⁷ A 16th-century Russian tsar whose life was dramatized in Aleksey Tolstoy’s play Tsar Fyodor Ioannovich; the play depicts him as a deeply moral man who is nonetheless incapable of ruling the country, a task instead taken up by his brother-in-law, Boris Godunov. (Z.B.)

Case in point: Franco Zeffirelli's spectacular film Jesus of Nazareth consists, for the most part, of stunning "moving illustrations" of the Gospel text, yet even here, Judas' subplot is out of line with the canonical version.

Particularly notable in this regard is a heretical version expounded by Borges, which he attributes to the fictional Swedish theologian Nils Runeberg:

...He begins by pointing out how superfluous was the act of Judas. [...] In order to identify a master who daily preached in the synagogue and who performed miracles before gatherings of thousands, the treachery of an apostle is not necessary.⁴⁸

The real motivation for Judas' actions was "an extravagant and even limitless asceticism":

The ascetic, for the greater glory of God, degrades and mortifies the flesh; Judas did the same with the spirit. He renounced honor, good, peace, the Kingdom of Heaven, as others, less heroically, renounced pleasure.⁴⁹

Hmm... Well, perhaps we won't be soaring to such heavenly heights of theological thought. For now, though, let's focus on finding motivations for Judas' actions that run a little closer to "the objective reality given us in our sensations."⁵⁰

"Thirty pieces of silver" as a motivation for betrayal, however, fails to hold water for the most pragmatic reason possible: what would such a paltry sum mean to Judas compared to the possibilities at his disposal as the Apostles' treasurer? If the driving force behind ⁴⁸ "Three Versions of Judas" from Fictions, trans. Anthony Kerrigan, p. 139.

⁴⁹ "Three Versions of Judas," pp. 140-141

⁵⁰ Vladimir Lenin, Materialism and Empirio-criticism, trans. Abraham Fineberg, p. 171.

Judas' actions was greed, then it would have suited him far better to quietly keep skimming money from the community's money box. Only a complete idiot (or a sovok⁵¹) would kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

But did Judas actually steal any money? John says so with total confidence (Jn 12:6); it is strange, however, that not one of the Synoptic Evangelists mention such a colorful detail, which would really bring the image of the traitor to life. One can only assume that John, as he had already done before, managed to get things completely mixed up. One could suppose that sometime before the tragedy between Jesus and Judas, there was an intense argument about finances. However, there was no proof that Judas was behind the shortfall; otherwise, Peter and the other Apostles would have found this episode far too significant to exclude from their narratives. Let's keep this in the back of our minds.

I should note that the text of the New Testament contains a direct indication that Christ foresaw Judas' betrayal long before his last trip to Jerusalem. I am talking about John's interpretation of the statements his teacher made after giving his Bread of Life Discourse and subsequently having many of his companions desert him:

Then Jesus said to the twelve, "Do you also want to go away?"
But Simon Peter answered Him, "Lord, to whom shall we go?"
[...] Jesus answered them, "Did I not choose you, the twelve, and one of you is a devil?" He spoke of Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon, for it was he who would betray Him, being one of the twelve. (Jn 6:67-71)

However, this is not as simple and clearcut as John would have it.

⁵¹ A sovok (otherwise known as Homo sovieticus) is a person who slavishly and naively adheres to a Soviet-era mentality; in Russian, the word literally means "dustpan." (Z.B.)

Let's start with the fact that, generally speaking, it does not follow from this text that Jesus specifically had Judas in mind; while this speculation may be logical in retrospect, it is speculation nonetheless. Furthermore, if one assumes that John's interpretation was valid, a serious theological issue arises: Holy Scripture now explicitly affirms the rather pagan idea that man's actions are fatally predetermined, which seems completely incompatible with all Christian philosophy. So, let's suppose that the statement John recorded was a legitimate one, and let's also suppose that it related directly to Judas. Even then, however, there's nothing that implies that Christ is referring to his future betrayal, as opposed to some other act of Judas'—perhaps one that he had just committed at that very moment.

While we're at it, what were the circumstances of Judas' death? The most common version is that of Matthew—he “went and hanged himself” (Mt 27:5). Meanwhile, Acts of the Apostles says something completely different:

He burst open in the middle and all his entrails gushed out. And it became known to all those dwelling in Jerusalem. (Ac 1:18-19)

Farrar opines, however, that this version is “not irreconcilable with the first,”⁵² and even comes up with a sort of hybrid: the rope Judas is hanging from snaps, he hits the ground from a great height, and his belly bursts open... I feel no need to comment on the plausibility of this theory.⁵³

And what's more: the prospect of Judas committing suicide out of regret, when considered in light of his actions during his teacher's arrest, is completely unconvincing from a psychological perspective. Such a thing has been known to happen with people who commit traitorous acts out of coercion or blackmail; Judas, however, acted on his own initiative, deliberately and in cold blood. We could, of course, accept the canonical version, that at the moment of his betrayal, he was “possessed by a demon” and subsequently became deluded. For now, though, let’s only turn to this “explanation” as a very last resort.

⁵² The Life of Christ, p. 419

⁵³ Archpriest Alexander Men was at least honest when he wrote that “the information contained in Mt 27:3-9 and Ac 1:16-20 is still [?!—K.E.] quite difficult to reconcile.” (K.E.)

Most puzzling of all, however, is the scene of Christ’s arrest in the Garden of Gethsemane. That is, it’s not that the number of inconsistencies (assuming we go by the canonical version) is merely large; it’s that the entire episode consists of literally nothing but inconsistencies, down to the very last detail. Let me once again yield the floor to Dombrovsky:

“As it happens, there’s a great confusion behind the whole story. After all, Christ didn’t hide himself away, he spoke in public. He could have been seized perfectly easily any day even without the help of Judas. ‘Why these swords and staves,’ he said when he was arrested. ‘You’ve seen me every day, and I preached among you. Why didn’t you take me then?’” “Logical,” smiled Surovtsev [an NKVD officer — K.E.]. “I mean, logical only for Christ. People who are arrested often ask that question. They are ignorant of the operative considerations involved.”⁵⁴

And that right there is exactly what we are going to discuss—just what kinds of “operative considerations” were there? Let’s ask ourselves a couple of questions.

1. Christ’s arrest could have taken place at any moment of the day on the streets of Jerusalem; he traveled with very few companions, and they certainly wouldn’t have been able to put up any resistance against the temple guards. Recall that the authorities encountered practically no problems when arresting the incomparably more popular John the Baptist. Why in the world did they let the Galileans leave the city and slip into the forested outskirts of Jerusalem, where it would be hard to monitor their movements even in broad daylight? In other words: what exactly did the Judean authorities have to gain by drastically complicating the arrest and conducting it in a quiet, isolated location in the dead of night?

⁵⁴ The Faculty of Useless Knowledge, p. 264

2. Judas' behavior during the arrest seems completely irrational. His task, which he completed successfully, was to lead the arrest team to the site (which was unknown to anyone in Jerusalem). At this point, any normal traitor would try to slip into the shadows (both figuratively and literally), and not thrust himself into the limelight to flaunt his exceptional merits. So why, pray tell, did Judas feel the need to point Christ out in such a public, theatrical fashion? During the time he spent preaching in Jerusalem, Judean secret police operatives certainly managed to get the best "visual" possible on him—and the arrest certainly couldn't have gone on without them. And on a related note: why did Judas need to pass himself off as the commander of the arrest team ("concerning Judas, who became a guide to those who arrested Jesus"—Ac 1:16) when in reality, he most certainly wasn't? After all, even if the high priests lost their minds and chose a defector to lead the unit (like they say: once a traitor, always a traitor, no matter who he betrayed), never in their lives would the Roman legionnaires willingly take orders from some Jewish thug who'd just betrayed his boss.

3. While we're at it, it's worth bringing our attention to the composition of the arrest team, which is bizarre from any point of view. First, as was previously mentioned, it consisted not only of Jews, but also of Roman soldiers, who the initiators of the arrest—the high priests—had no direct authority over.⁵⁵ Seeking the legionnaires' participation in the operation would have required them, at the very minimum, to inform the procurator accordingly, but that would mean wasting precious time on the inevitable negotiations—and what for? It could be justified if Caiaphas were expecting serious armed resistance; such a risk was negligible, however—compared to the very real possibility that the alarmed sect might simply vanish into the night, effectively becoming a needle in a haystack. Second, the Romans, who numbered no more than two to three dozen soldiers, were commanded by a “thousandman” (a military tribune). The participation in this operation of such a high-ranking officer (the equivalent of a colonel in today's military) clearly speaks to how seriously Pilate took the high priests' “request for international aid.”⁵⁶ So just why does he start playing the fool the next morning, portraying his relationship to the defendant as one of benevolent neutrality? Third, in addition to the temple guards (as well as the inevitable undercover detectives), the Judean contingent was chock full of high priests' servants carrying clubs. If I may ask: what need was there to suddenly call for such a “total mobilization,” and what use could this riff-raff have possibly served—other than to step on the actual professionals' toes?

⁵⁵ “The Johannine version that Jesus was arrested by the whole or a part of a Roman cohort, commanded by its tribune, with the Jewish temple police and its commanding officer in attendance, is now being accepted as the true statement of facts by most contemporary scholars” (Haim Cohn, The Trial and Death of Jesus, p. 78). Cohn himself, whose book specifically analyzes the legal intricacies of the “trial of Jesus of Nazareth,” considers this detail extremely strange and demanding of special explanation. Small wonder—you have to think the former Attorney General of Israel would be well-informed on how to actually carry out an arrest... (K.E.)

⁵⁶ The exact phrase used by the Soviet government to justify its invasion of Afghanistan in 1979. (Z.B.)

4. It is unclear why the arrest team took absolutely no measures to detain the Apostles. After all, even if the authorities decided to ignore their previous complicity in spreading subversive propaganda, they still put up direct armed resistance the moment Christ was arrested.⁵⁷ Nevertheless, there were no consequences when Peter sliced off the ear of the high priests' servant Malchus (Jn 18:10), and the Apostles were allowed to slip away unimpeded. This is especially unclear considering the events that would occur later that night—the three attempts to arrest Peter specifically due to his membership in Christ's inner circle, completely unrelated to his part in the armed confrontation with the guards.

5. As Sherlock Holmes once said, “the more outre and grotesque an incident is, the more carefully it deserves to be examined, and the very point which appears to complicate a case is, when duly considered and scientifically handled, the one which is most likely to elucidate it.”⁵⁸ In our case, that detail is... the torches; yes, the very torches the arrest team brought to the site (e.g. Jn 18:3). The issue is that these events took place during the Jewish Passover, which falls on a full moon. The torches might have been useful in total darkness, if the arrest team needed to sweep a cordoned-off section of the garden (though even then, they would do just as much harm as good) or identify detainees. But what purpose did it serve (and who did it benefit) to illuminate a garden that was already flooded with moonlight, leaving the arrest team exposed on their way to a location they were already familiar with?

⁵⁷ According to the Old Russian version of The Jewish War (IX:3), a great number of people were killed during Jesus' arrest. (K.E.)

⁵⁸ Arthur Conan Doyle, The Hound of the Baskervilles, p. 242.

The Last Supper and Gethsemane

Who Was Working Behind the Scenes?

Let's not forget another detail: at the time of the Last Supper, Jesus already knew that one of his Apostles had betrayed him. While he never mentioned Judas by name, he did give some rather broad hints as to his identity, following which the traitor had no other choice but to run off, making use of the loophole his teacher left him:

For some thought, because Judas had the money box, that Jesus had said to him, "Buy those things we need for the feast," or that he should give something to the poor. Having received the piece of bread, he then went out immediately. And it was night.
(Jn 13:29-30)

Why Jesus never mentioned his traitor by name—whether because he wasn't totally confident in his information and his hints were a way of verifying it, or because he simply didn't want any bloodshed (some of his Apostles were real tough guys, especially Peter)—isn't all that important. A more interesting question is: how did Jesus obtain the information that someone in his inner circle had turned on him?

This question might seem completely asinine. Clearly, Christ knew about it on account of his divine omniscience; besides, how could he acquire that sort of information under the Apostles' noses when they were always by his side? Well, I'm not going to touch on the topic of his "omniscience," but as for Christ's lack of stable contacts outside of his typical social circle, as described by the Evangelists—that, I'm willing to dispute.

First off: why was the Last Supper so secretive?⁵⁹ What do we know about the house it took place in, the starting point for Christ and the Apostles' subsequent journey to Gethsemane? No need to strain your memory or raid your bookshelf for a copy of the New Testament—it contains absolutely no information on the subject. Which is quite strange; the Evangelists always go out of their way to describe the owners of the houses their teacher stopped at for some reason or another, but as for the place where such a crucial event occurred—not a peep.⁶⁰

The description of how Christ and the Apostles found this house is worth quoting, in my opinion. On Thursday morning, the Apostles ask their teacher where he is going to have his Passover meal. Then, Christ sends Peter and John out to Jerusalem, supplying them with the following instructions:

And He said to them, "Behold, when you have entered the city, a man will meet you carrying a pitcher of water; follow him into the house which he enters. Then you shall say to the master of the house, 'The Teacher says to you, "Where is the guest room where I may eat the Passover with My disciples?"' Then he will show you a large, furnished upper room; there make ready." So they went and found it just as He had said to them, and they prepared the Passover. (Lk 22:10-13)

⁵⁹ In the Russian Orthodox Church, the Last Supper is commonly referred to as the Secret Supper; with this in mind, a more faithful translation of this sentence would be: "Why was the Secret Supper, well, secret?" (Z.B.)

⁶⁰ In Christian tradition, the Upper Room—the place where the Last Supper was held—is taken to be located at David's Tomb, which is on the southern slope of Mount Zion ("Jerusalem," Bible Encyclopedia, vol. 2, pp. 79-82). It is this room that features in, for example, the numerous picturesque paintings depicting this episode. However, by no means can we take this point of view. That David's Tomb was only constructed in the fourth century C.E. is only half the problem; as far as our approach is concerned, it is far more relevant that the Scriptures directly state that the Last Supper took place in a residential building (see below). (K.E.)

Quite frankly, this episode doesn't sound like it's from Sacred Scripture so much as Seventeen Moments of Spring (or rather, Aquarium).⁶¹ It's pretty clear we're dealing with liaisons, physical and verbal passwords, a safehouse, and a classical technique to detect shadowing (by means of countersurveillance, as carried out by the partner of the "man with the pitcher"). On that note, it's also clear that Peter and John were sent there specifically to check whether or not the safehouse had been compromised. The owner of the house, in full accordance with the requirements of secrecy (which evidently haven't changed over the past twenty centuries), never once met his visitors—for which reason the Gospels lack any information about him whatsoever.

The Evangelists clearly deemed these facts unworthy of their attention; for us, however, it is quite significant that Jesus clandestinely (or at least discreetly) kept in contact with at least one group of people in Jerusalem with whom the Apostles were not familiar. The members of this group, on the other hand (which included the "man with the pitcher"), knew the Apostles by sight at the very least.

My interest now stoked by Jesus' clandestine contacts, I started to look over the text of the New Testament in that light, and immediately found a number of promising episodes. Three or four in, however, I had to tell myself, "Wait a second!"—I felt like I was molding the facts to fit my preconceptions. Any more of that and I'd be just like one of those half-wit conspiracy theorists who can sniff out a Global Judeo-Masonic Plot in a six-point snowflake. But there's still one episode we should look at, since it might tie directly into the events of Holy Week: the Transfiguration of the Lord.

⁶¹ A memoir by former Soviet military intelligence officer Viktor Suvorov. (Z.B.)

Not long after his third (and last) trip into Jerusalem, Christ, accompanied by Peter, John, and James, ascended a mountain to partake in prayer. A number of events subsequently occurred, from which, as usual, we will refrain from commenting on the outright miracles: the illumination of Jesus' face and clothing, the cloud that hung over those present, and the voice from the heavens. Here is the "solid residue" that remains:

But Peter and those with him were heavy with sleep; and when they were fully awake, they saw His glory and the two men who stood with Him. Then it happened, as they were parting from Him, that Peter said to Jesus, "Master, it is good for us to be here; and let us make three tabernacles: one for You, one for Moses, and one for Elijah"—not knowing what he said. (Lk 9:32-33)

However, Jesus never said anything to confirm his disciples' speculation that the men speaking with him were really Moses and Elijah. The most interesting part is what happens afterwards:

Now as they came down from the mountain, Jesus commanded them, saying, "Tell the vision to no one until the Son of Man is risen from the dead." (Mt 17:9)

So they kept this word to themselves, questioning what the rising from the dead meant. (Mk 9:10)

Simply put: three of the Apostles accidentally witnessed a meeting between Jesus and two unknown men, which was clearly not meant for their eyes. Why else would their teacher have demanded that they keep their mouths shut until his dying day?

However, let's return to our general line of inquiry—the events of Holy Thursday. So, how and when could the information on Judas' betrayal have been relayed to Jesus without the Apostles knowing (the information's source being another question entirely)? There are countless ways it could have been transmitted (for example, through a practically undetectable liaison disguised as a beggar on a porch), but in our case, we can make the simplest assumption possible: Jesus found the corresponding message in a previously arranged location in the safehouse—"large, furnished, and prepared" (Mk 14:15)—following which he accused Judas of betraying him.

Another mystery remains, however. Following the conclusion of the Last Supper, Jesus and the remaining eleven Apostles left Jerusalem and made their flight to Gethsemane—an olive grove at the foot of the Mount of Olives, which lies to the east of the city.⁶² Judging from the lengthy conversation they had on the way there, the route was not a short one. It was at Gethsemane, after the Agony in the Garden, that Christ was arrested. Nowhere in the Gospels are there any indications that the Apostles had previously been informed of their teacher's plans—namely, his intended destination after leaving Jerusalem. Judas, on the other hand, who left the Last Supper long before its conclusion, managed to lead the arrest team exactly where they needed to go—the Garden of Gethsemane.

I hope we won't try to ascribe the gift of omniscience to this man, too? Let's think this through logically, then. Now, as for how Judas managed to guess the location, that's more or less clear: apparently, Gethsemane served as a constant refuge for the Apostles over the past few days ("And in the daytime He was teaching in the temple, but at night He went out and stayed on the mountain called Olivet"—Lk 21:37). It should be noted that the Garden is actually home to a crag with a large cave, which presumably served as a place of shelter for the Apostles.⁶³ It was ostensibly from there that they headed out to Jerusalem for the Last Supper. Another puzzle: on what grounds was Judas sure that Jesus would return that night to his obviously compromised base? Putting himself in his teacher's place, he ought to have supposed that he would try to evade detection and flee Jerusalem at once, as he had repeatedly done before (for example, Jn 10:39-40). These "disappearances" of Jesus are interesting in and of themselves, but they are irrelevant to the discussion at hand.

⁶² Some food for thought: the village of Bethany, which was the setting for a number of miraculous events (see above), is located on the same Mount of Olives as the Garden of Gethsemane, albeit the former is on its southeastern slope, while the latter is on its western slope. (K.E.)

We've somehow gotten used to assuming that all of Christ's actions (or rather, lack thereof) that night were rooted in his firm intention to "drink of this cup." For actual operational-search measures to succeed, however, detectives need to at least genuinely consider the motivations of those they are pursuing. Do Judas and the Sanhedrin's officers seem like they could penetrate the Savior's thoughts so precisely? The question, as I see it, is a rhetorical one. And on the other hand: suppose Jesus had already made his final arrangements with regard to his own life. However, could a man like him choose to stay alongside his disciples and consciously expose them to a deadly, not to mention completely senseless risk? At the time of his arrest, the Teacher declares, "'If you seek Me, let these go their way' (that the saying might be fulfilled which He spoke, 'Of those whom You gave Me I have lost none')" (Jn 18:8-9). But let's be honest: his own contribution to his disciples remaining alive seems minimal at best. After all, it's simply a "criminal oversight" that they weren't slaughtered on the spot during the incident with Malchus!

All these considerations allow us to make the following assumption. That night, Jesus had some task waiting for him at Gethsemane—something so important that, unless he completed it, he could neither leave Jerusalem (even under threat of arrest) or voluntarily give himself up to the high priests; Judas likewise knew of this task. We can assume that in the garden—the place where he had most recently taken shelter—Jesus was to either take something at a predetermined location, or, on the contrary, leave something, or—most likely of all—meet someone. And if there really was someone waiting for him in the garden (recall, for example, the nighttime visit paid to Jesus a year prior by Nicodemus, a member of the Sanhedrin), then it becomes clear why Jesus tried to reach Gethsemane before the detectives, paying no heed to the danger involved.

⁶³ "Gethsemane," Bible Encyclopedia, vol. 1, pp. 156-157.

When was this meeting supposed to take place (whether it occurred in reality is a different question entirely)? I think it was the very moment Jesus retreated alone into the garden to pray—and here's why. Let's compare the Agony in the Garden with the Transfiguration of the Lord (see above). In both cases, Christ breaks off from the disciples so he can pray in solitude. In both cases, he is accompanied by three Apostles—the same three, no less: Peter, John, and James. In both cases, all three “bodyguards” strangely fall asleep. Doesn't it sound like there's a few too many coincidences going on here, and the two stories actually describe a single meeting the Teacher took part in, the true nature of which was poorly understood by his Apostles? Especially considering there's also a direct indication that Jesus was not alone in the garden (Lk 22:43); admittedly, the Evangelist believed his teacher was accompanied by an “angel,” but that is just pure speculation.

Let's ask ourselves a slightly different question: could the Apostles have possibly made out the person conversing with their teacher further off into the garden (assuming such a meeting actually took place)? I think not, and here's why. Let's recall another event from that night—Peter's threefold denial in Caiaphas' courtyard:

Now the servants and officers who had made a fire of coals stood there, for it was cold, and they warmed themselves. And

Peter stood with them and warmed himself. (Jn 18:18)

This was in the courtyard of a mansion in the city; you can only imagine how bitterly cold it was that spring night in the Garden of Gethsemane. As a result, it's quite reasonable to suppose that the Apostles also made a fire to keep warm. And in principle, that meant they couldn't make out anything beyond the circle of light.

But of course, could the three “attendants” have noticed anything while they were sleeping on the job? For what it's worth, their strange slumber seems understandable and natural when taken in light of the last assumption. You have to think that a few minutes into their vigil, the disciples (side note: didn't the Teacher give these guys the task of keeping watch?) were freezing to the bone and decided—just for a second!—to warm themselves by the fire. Alas, “seconds” like these always end the same way—the heat gets you drowsy in a flash, and then it's lights out... So I wouldn't put too much stock in their testimony, either, but even then, they certainly noticed something—before and after their stay by the fire. In any case, the information on the “angel” visiting Jesus definitely comes from them—there was simply no one else who could have seen it.

The Empty Tomb

Shortly after the Crucifixion, another rather mysterious pair of figures came onto the scene. One of them was Joseph of Arimathea, “a prominent council member, who was himself waiting for the kingdom of God” (Mk 15:43); in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter, he is characterized as a “friend of Pilate and of the Lord.” It was this man who received the procurator’s permission to collect the body of an executed criminal—the “King of the Jews”—and bury him in his own tomb. The Evangelists depict Joseph as a “secret disciple of Christ” (Jn 19:38), though nowhere in the text of the New Testament are there any previous indications of him having any contact with Jesus or the Apostles—either before or, strangest of all, after the burial. Granted, there is one legend that claims he was the first to preach the Gospel in Britain, but even the official Church considers this unlikely.⁶⁴

Assisting him was Nicodemus, another member of the Sanhedrin. Unlike Joseph, Nicodemus had actually met Christ twice before; on the first occasion, he spent a whole night conversing with him (Jn 3:1-21), and in another episode, he openly came out in his support before other members of the Sanhedrin (Jn 7:50-52). Thus, we can assume that the initiator of the burial was not actually Joseph, but Nicodemus. The legend of Nicodemus’ eventual fate seems far more modest in comparison (“he was subsequently baptized by the Apostles”⁶⁵), but for that reason, it sounds far more believable.

The fact remains, however, that two prominent members of the local political establishment rather openly defied the Judean authorities, and did so at the very moment it was clear playtime was over; meanwhile, all of Christ’s “official” disciples were quaking in their boots and concerned solely with their own survival.

⁶⁴ “Joseph,” Bible Encyclopedia, vol. 2, pp. 111-115.

⁶⁵ Nicodemus,” Bible Encyclopedia, vol. 3, p. 71.

So what prompted them to do this? Were they merely “waiting for the Kingdom of God?” Hmm... For what it’s worth, Joseph and Nicodemus actually had something to lose here—unlike the disciples, who had the social status of bums.

But all of this is just a preamble. Now it’s time for us to move straight to one of the key events in our story: the disappearance of Christ’s body from a guarded tomb. This tomb, which (as mentioned above) belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, was a new burial vault that had just been carved out from the rock, and was located in a fairly isolated place close to Jerusalem; the latter detail made the guards’ task much easier. The entrance to the tomb, which was covered by a heavy boulder (McDowell gives its weight as 1.5 tons) and secured with an imperial seal, was guarded by Roman soldiers. The fact they were specifically Roman (that is, highly disciplined, and neutral with regard to intra-Judean disputes) plays a significant role in McDowell and Gladkov’s arguments, and they give detailed and convincing justifications for it.⁶⁶

At dawn on the third day, the guards discover to their astonishment that the stone has been rolled aside and the tomb is now empty, and immediately inform the high priests of this:

When they had assembled with the elders and consulted together, they gave a large sum of money to the soldiers, saying,

⁶⁶ Here we could make the following objection: in response to the high priests’ request, “Pilate says to them, ‘You have a guard; go your way, make it as secure as you know how’” (Mt 27:65). In principle, the procurator’s words could be interpreted as a refusal (“You guys have your own temple guard—go deal with your own scandals!”). McDowell, however, makes a purely linguistic argument that in the original Gospel text (unlike many of its translations into European languages), all three verbs should be read as being in the same mood: the imperative. Therefore, what this sentence really sounds like is “have a guard; go your way, make it as secure as you know how,” that is: “Take some soldiers and act as you see fit going forward.” (K.E.)

“Tell them, ‘His disciples came at night and stole Him away while we slept.’ And if this comes to the governor’s ears, we will appease him and make you secure.” So they took the money and did as they were instructed; and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day. (Mt 28:12-15)

Pilate subsequently figured that the high priests’ bribe proved the soldiers’ innocence, and decided not to punish the latter.

I am perfectly willing to admit that there were some members of the Judean hierarchy who genuinely believed in the divine, messianic essence of Christ. The Romans, however, are a different story altogether; everything historical and literary sources tell us about their mentality suggests that Roman society at that time was actually quite secular in nature. It is precisely this fact that is typically used to explain ancient civilization’s fundamental inability to counteract the moral expansion of Christianity several decades later. For this reason, the very thought that the pragmatic Romans, who failed to show piety even to their own gods, were seriously willing to accept the Jewish legends of a Messiah who would rise again three days after his death—the very thought of that seems absurd to me. That’s point number one.

Point number two: it bears mentioning that the disciplinary code of the Roman army was quite severe. McDowell notes that soldiers who had fallen asleep at their post were subject to execution without exception (regardless of the result of their negligence). With both these points in mind, we have no choice but to admit that every action taken by every party involved in this incident—the guards, the high priests, and Pilate—is completely absurd (no matter the actual reason for the tomb being empty). It’s like they each agreed to do the one thing that would work most effectively against their own interests. Judge for yourself.

For example, take how the guards discover the loss of the “protected object” in the morning. If the soldiers had really kept watch all night, they could be sure this appalling circumstance wasn’t the result of any complicated games on the part of the Judean authorities. On the other hand, it was the guards themselves who discovered the loss, and not one of the officers. In such a situation, the most logical thing to do would be to change shifts at dawn as planned and brazenly report that everything was in order—maybe they’d actually buy it. If the Judean authorities go on to find the open tomb and start making a fuss, just put on a poker face and declare that when the guards changed shifts—cross my heart!—everything was A-OK, and I have no way of knowing what went on there afterwards; those Asian ragheads can go look after their own stiffs, for all I care—I’ve had it up to here with them, Your Honor!

But still, let’s suppose the commander of the guard isn’t a savvy sergeant major of Soviet vintage, but what one might call “an honest, yet stupid young lady.” Why then, however, does this disciplined Roman bring his penitential report not to his commanding officers, as regulations require, but to the local authorities? Could he really be counting on the protection of Pilate’s hated Sanhedrin? Well, in that case, he’s just plain dumb. Then things get even stupider: the Sanhedrin offers to pay the guards a modest sum to sign their own death sentence (admitting they fell asleep at their post). The guards agree and go about earning their bribe honestly: they shout from the rooftops about an act of official misconduct they have supposedly committed—on the off chance that Roman leadership is still woefully ignorant of their exploits.

As for the high priests: if they really wanted to dispute the fact of the resurrection, they should have wasted no time in accusing the soldiers of sleeping at their post and missing the theft of the body. Without a doubt, the Judeans knew that in the eyes of Roman officers, this incident simply couldn't have any other explanation, and the soldiers' babble about "miracles" would only further prove their guilt. Just try to imagine a modern-day general whose underlings attempt to foist a report like this onto him: "While we were standing watch, a flying saucer landed next to our post and paralyzed the personnel with a blue ray of light, at which point little green men entered the depot we were guarding and carried out 42 assault rifles and 12 boxes of hand grenades." Three guesses how the general would react? In the very act of negotiating with and bribing the guards, however, the high priests all but admitted to their belief in Christ's resurrection—as Pilate would later acknowledge himself.

And now, the procurator. First, his subordinates have fallen asleep at their post and lost track of the "protected object," an act deserving of the death penalty. Even worse, they're taking bribes from the local poobah and carrying out his orders; in any army in the world, this would be considered an even worse crime than the original offense. In our case, however, two wrongs surprisingly make a right: the guards are ultimately spared any punishment whatsoever by Pilate—he is apparently satisfied by their account of the body's miraculous disappearance. I can't help but think back to another episode in this regard. Later on, the Apostle Peter just as mysteriously disappears from a guarded prison cell; however, Herod never even thinks of taking the "miraculous" nature of this event into account, and immediately executes the guards—in accordance with regulations (Ac 12:19).

Speaking of St. Peter's disappearance:

That night Peter was sleeping, bound with two chains between two soldiers; and the guards before the door were keeping the prison. [...] An angel [...] struck Peter on the side and raised him up, saying, "Arise quickly!" And his chains fell off his hands. Then the angel said to him, "Gird yourself and tie on your sandals. [...] Put on your garment and follow me.” [...] When they were past the first and the second guard posts, they came to the iron gate that leads to the city, which opened to them of its own accord; and they went out and went down one street, and immediately the angel departed from him. (Ac 12:6-10)

I don't know about you, but I'm personally on Herod's side here: while of course, these events can be considered mysterious, by no means can they be considered miraculous. And if Herod was interested in the identity of the Angel behind this caper (and you know he was!), then he certainly didn't consult his theologian on staff, but the chief of his security service. It should be noted that this wasn't the first time powerful messengers of a Higher Power pulled tricks like this to set prisoners free (for example, Ac 5:18-24). It's no surprise that the patience of the Tetrarch of Galilee und Perea wore thin (“Am I king or am I not king?”⁶⁷), and he tried putting these utterly insolent Angels in their place.

In refuting the theory that Christ's body was actually stolen by his disciples, McDowell, among other things, brings up the following point. He argues that it was unthinkable for a citizen of Judea to break the Roman seal that was placed on the tomb. The penalty for this under Roman law was inverted crucifixion, and the Empire's secret services knew neither sleep nor rest until the perpetrator was captured. While this information is certainly interesting, McDowell strangely fails to observe that, like it or not, the seal was still broken, and as it happened, there was no investigation into it—not even the most perfunctory one. That being said, it would be easier to quickly crucify a couple of disciples and close the case of the broken seal that way; this was exactly how Nero would close the case of Rome's “burning” sometime later. In reality, as we know, nothing of the sort ever came to pass, and this fits in perfectly with the general picture of the Roman authorities' strange benevolence towards Christ and his followers.

⁶⁷ A quote from Tsar Fyodor Ioannovich (see note 47).

I can only find one explanation for this strange turn of events. The testimony of the negligent guards, as well as some other details of the incident—were they to surface in the course of an official investigation—would for some reason be so uncomfortable for Pilate that he preferred to let the entire affair blow over. In this episode in general, it seems as if both the Roman and the Judean authorities are acting in accordance with a tacit agreement, simultaneously attempting to avert a scandal that might be fraught with dangerous revelations. We could assume, for example, that both of these “frenemies” were the object of serious blackmail on the part of a certain “third force.”

In this regard, the apocryphal Gospel of Peter is quite remarkable. It was apparently written with the aim of dispelling all doubt as to the fact of the Resurrection; here, it occurs directly in front of a large group of people, and with the direct participation of two angels:

The heavens were opened and that two males who had much radiance had come down from there and come near the sepulcher. But that stone which had been thrust against the door, having rolled by itself, went a distance off the side; and the sepulcher opened, and both the young men entered. [...] Again [the guards] see three males who have come out from the sepulcher, with the two supporting the other one, and a cross following them, and the head of the two reaching unto heaven, but that of the one being led out by a hand by them going beyond the heavens.⁶⁸

⁶⁸ Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: from Gethsemane to the Grave, v. 2, p. 1320

In the end, the Evangelist overdid it a little—the number of miracles per square meter of text fails to abide by even the most lenient standards of realism. Perhaps this is why this version was considered apocryphal.

However, it contains one particularly curious detail: this is the only Gospel out of all of them where the guard is combined. It consists of Roman legionnaires led by the centurion Petronius⁶⁹ as well as Jewish elders and scribes, who jointly keep watch—a stretch if there ever was one!—from inside a single tent. It's quite telling that the unknown Evangelist made sure (among other things) to include such a detail when naively composing his “extra-convincing” version of the Resurrection. Clearly, a combined guard (which would ensure that each faction kept the other in check) would put people's doubts to rest far more convincingly than the exclusively Roman guard in the canonical version.

Still, let's take another look at the series of events that led to the mysterious emptying of the tomb, starting from the very beginning. Let's rewind the tape a little to Friday afternoon, when Nicodemus and Joseph collect Christ's body and perform all the rituals over it that are required by Jewish custom. McDowell himself gives a detailed description of such rituals, which I read with great (purely ethnographical) interest. Jews would wrap their dead in numerous layers of fabric strips, which were soaked in aromatic substances. Moreover, the fabric could hold up to 40-50 kilograms' worth of resinous material; the corpse would eventually be enclosed in a thick shell of fabric and resin. The “empty burial shrouds” that Peter and John discovered in Christ's tomb were something like an empty cocoon a butterfly had fluttered out of.

⁶⁹ The Greek word kentyrion (“centurion”), which is used in the text of this Gospel, forces us to assume that its author was a Roman, and not a resident of Palestine. The issue here is that in all the canonical Gospels, the Roman officer ranks of centurion and military tribune are rendered as, respectively, hekatontarch (for example, Lk 7:2-9) and chiliarch (for example, Jn 18:12). (K.E.)

Before nightfall, Nicodemus and Joseph manage to transport the body to a tomb outside the city and seal the entrance with a stone; all of this occurs in the presence of Jesus' female companions:

And the women who had come with Him from Galilee followed after, and they observed the tomb and how His body was laid.
(Lk 23:55)

Speaking of the stone: you have to think that it wasn't anywhere near as heavy as people sometimes claim (Mk 16:4)—after all, it was quietly rolled into place that evening by two men who clearly weren't weightlifters. The next day (Saturday), the Judean leadership comes to a realization:

The chief priests and Pharisees gathered together to Pilate, saying, "Sir, we remember, while He was still alive, how that deceiver said, 'After three days I will rise.' Therefore command that the tomb be made secure until the third day, lest His disciples come by night and steal Him away, and say to the people, 'He has risen from the dead.'" (Mt 27:62-64)

For this occasion, the Jewish high priests decide to desecrate their sacred day of Sabbath rest; with soldiers in tow, they head out to the tomb and place a seal on the stone at its entrance. The Roman guard stationed at the tomb...

Wait!!! Hold on, run that by me one more time!! "The next morning, the high priests..." There it is: that means that from early Friday evening to late Saturday morning, the unsealed tomb was left completely unsupervised. It makes me wonder: just what did the Roman soldiers end up "taking into safekeeping?"

Second Warning to McDowell (Yellow Card)

Needless to say, this detail has gone completely overlooked by Christian commentators. Here's what Gladkov says, for example:

Most of all, [the high priests] needed to ascertain whether Jesus' body had been stolen the previous night, from Friday into Saturday, or else they would have had no reason to set a guard [...]. And they certainly ordered the stone rolled aside, verified that the Lord's body had not been stolen, and only then rolled back the stone and placed the seal upon it...

While it doesn't directly follow from the Gospel text ("So they went and made the tomb secure, sealing the stone and setting the guard"—Mt 27:66), I actually agree with Gladkov here: there was certainly an inspection. However, let's try to imagine how this would have played out in reality.

The soldiers roll aside the stone covering the entrance to the burial chamber. The "delegates" from the Sanhedrin—devout Jews—are in a rather unenviable position. It's bad enough they've already defiled themselves by breaking the Sabbath; even worse, now they need to look over a tomb (recall the Jews' shock at Jesus' desire to see the deceased Lazarus). Do you really think they'd risk adding another terrifying breach of Mosaic Law—coming in contact with a dead body—to their list of Sabbath labors, just so they can check whether the tomb's occupant is actually a corpse or... an empty cocoon of burial shrouds? I'd bet my life that at most, they stuck the very tips of their noses into the vault, then made a mad dash for the nearest synagogue to atone for their sins, yelling over their shoulder, "Seal it up!" The legionnaires presumably exchanged glances, twirled their fingers by their temple, then sent one of the rookies to the next village over for some hooch and leisurely started going about their duties.

So here's the version you've all been waiting for. After waiting for the women to leave, Joseph and Nicodemus extract the body from the tomb after nightfall; in its place, they leave a dummy they've prepared in advance—a fabric “cocoon.” In the morning, the two of them, by way of proxy, sell their colleagues in the Sanhedrin on the idea that they need to guard the tomb; they have perfectly anticipated what circumstances might prompt them to take on such a “rush job” on the occasion of the Passover Sabbath. The appearance of the guards at the tomb is a crucial element of the plan, which allows them to kill two birds with one stone. First, it will preemptively invalidate the high priests' inevitable attempt to write off the body's disappearance as a scheme on the part of the disciples; second, it will give the perpetrators of the hoax a convincing alibi and divert all suspicion away from them.

On the night from Saturday into Sunday, Nicodemus and Joseph—again by way of proxy—inform the procurator that his men are guarding an “empty shell.” An officer is immediately sent to the site, who confirms that there really is nothing inside the tomb but rags. Pilate's first thought is a perfectly natural one: he has fallen into a trap the high priests have laid for him, with the goal of compromising the procurator the Jews so strongly hate. All he can do now is go on the offensive. On his instructions, the legionnaires appear at the Sanhedrin at dawn and make a ruckus, threatening to blow the lid off this whole Jew racket and show the rudely awakened high priests for the crooks they really are. The high priests, no less embarrassed than Pilate, vow and swear that they have nothing to do with the affair, and come to a mutually satisfactory conclusion: assume that Christ's body was stolen by his disciples. After holding out a short while for appearance's sake, the soldiers agree; the procurator's order has been fulfilled, both sides have more or less saved face, and a little money has come trickling in from the Sanhedrin, and so they return to their barracks with “a sense of pride and accomplishment.”

Meanwhile, Joseph and Nicodemus brilliantly finish up their scheme. In the most dangerous scenario, the Romans conspire with the high priests to reseal the tomb at once and make it look like nothing has happened (an act Pilate wouldn’t dare carry out himself, fearing it could be a clever provocation on the part of the Sanhedrin). In that case, of course, Joseph could open the sealed tomb in front of witnesses the next day—he owned it, after all!—and “discover” the disappearance of the body; the problem there, however, would be that his part in the scheme would become so obvious that it could no longer be denied. For that reason, the first person to discover the open and empty tomb needs to be someone other than him. And that’s where the Myrrhbearers come in.

For almost two millennia, people have read this scene over and over and surprisingly failed to ask themselves a simple question: what goal, strictly speaking, did Mary Magdalene, Mary of Jacob, and Salome have when visiting Christ’s tomb at the crack of dawn? Just what rituals were they planning to perform, if they themselves had witnessed his interment on Friday and knew that their teacher had been given a “first-class” burial (Jn 19:39-40)? Why did they bring spices with them (hence the title “Myrrhbearers”), if Nicodemus had already applied “a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds” (Jn 19:39), a fact they were more than well aware of? And just where did they get the brilliant idea to disturb the peace of a dead man—a sin in any set of human laws, and completely unthinkable in Jewish law? But if we assume that the true goal of the Myrrhbearers’ pre-dawn vigil (as well as that of Peter and John, who were soon mobilized by Mary Magdalene) was to serve as witnesses to the body’s disappearance and prevent the authorities from quietly resealing the tomb, then everything immediately falls into place.

So, Joseph and Nicodemus' cunning, yet risky plan went off without a hitch. But when you really think about it, what were they actually risking? The only true weak spot in their plan was the sealing of the tomb, when the body's disappearance might have theoretically been discovered—but so what? On the night from Friday into Saturday, just about anyone could have stolen the body from the unguarded grave. Even then, for what it's worth, Joseph and Nicodemus' "indirect alibi" would still be of some use to them; after all, in the event of an investigation, it could be shown that they were the ones who originally came up with the idea of guarding the burial site. So even in the worst possible scenario, the guys would simply "break even."

But what goal did they have in mind when hatching this scheme? Well, the answer to that is pretty clear. It's plainly obvious that if a major scandal were to break out, it would be the powerful high priests—Caiaphas and his father-in-law Annas—who would bear the brunt of the outrage. In the year AD 36, Caiaphas was disgracefully "dismissed from his present position" and even stripped of the title of high priest, which, as a rule, lasted for life. And who's to say it wasn't the scandalous story of some Galilean pretender's body disappearing almost two years previously (or alternatively: killing the Son of God) that wound up being the last straw? Moreover, Caiaphas' fall led to the rival Sadducee faction coming into power, under the leadership of the new high priest Jonathan; it was evidently this faction to which Joseph and Nicodemus belonged as well. Jonathan's policy was more pro-Roman than his predecessor's, for which he was killed by Jewish terrorists known as the Sicarii; as for Joseph, let us recall that he was a "friend of Pilate and the Lord." Looks like everything's coming together...

A simpler and more straightforward option is also possible: the stolen body was simply used as blackmail against the ruling Judean clan. “Give us 45 gold talents/the post of deputy chief of staff of the secret police/tax farming payments in the province of Edom (delete as appropriate, fill in as necessary) and we’ll return the body. Or else youse gonna regret it...” Clearly, the deal fell through; the outcome is apparent.

From this point on, I’ll let McDowell try and sort out this version. Once again, I will invoke my “right of veto” and simply refuse to examine this hypothesis, as it runs counter to my “presumption of honesty”—an option that my absentee opponent, unfortunately for him, lacks entirely. As I’m sure you remember, I set out to construct a version based entirely on the integrity of the Savior’s associates, and I have no intention of backing down. Of course, this makes for a more challenging task, but accordingly a far more interesting one.

As for McDowell, his position seems unenviable indeed. I have honestly tested this version for “fracture and tension” and have yet to find any noticeable weak spots. And considering that last time (with the “Uncrucified Christ” hypothesis), McDowell’s ship ran into a floating mine, now it seems the captain has failed to spot an enemy submarine, which has given him a salvo from all six torpedo tubes.

The Appearances of the Risen Christ

Now let's turn to the chronologically last, but by far the most important knot of events—the appearances Christ made following his resurrection. McDowell makes the following rational arguments in favor of their reality:

1. One could hardly suppose that any hostile, or at least critically inclined witnesses (of whom there was surely a decent number) would have missed any opportunity to expose the absurd rumors of a dead man appearing to the living. As of yet, however, no traces of any such denunciations have ever been found in any archive.

2. The witnesses to these appearances numbered in the dozens, and on one occasion (on the mountain in Galilee) he appeared to “500 brethren” at once. Is it conceivable to suppose that 500 people were simultaneously mistaken, or that all of them, to a man, conspired to lie about it?

3. People met the risen Christ both one-on-one and in groups, in a wide variety of emotional states, and at different times of the day (Mary Magdalene at dawn, the travelers on the road to Emmaus in the afternoon, and the Apostles in the evening, after dark). The diverse set of circumstances in which the appearances took place allows us to reject the commonly cited explanation of atheists that they were the product of “hallucinations.”

4. McDowell draws attention to the fact that Christ's first appearances were not to his disciples, but to women—namely, Mary Magdalene and the Myrrhbearers. In his opinion, this is an important (albeit indirect) argument against the possibility of fraud. The issue here is that women's testimony held no legal weight according to Jewish law, so it would have made absolutely no sense to stage a hoax for them to witness.

As you can see, the persuasiveness of these arguments varies quite widely.

1. McDowell forgive me, but his point regarding the lack of recorded denunciations of the Resurrection is a paraphrase of a popular joke from the time of the “Anti-Cosmopolitan Campaign.” Western scientists find a piece of copper wire in an Egyptian tomb from the third millennium BCE; on that basis, they conclude that the ancient Egyptians were already using the telegraph. In response, Soviet scientists announce that no one has ever found any copper wires in Russian tombs from the third millennium BCE; therefore, the Russians of that time were already using the wireless telegraph.

But on a serious note, the complete uniformity of archival data on a particular issue is generally a double-edged sword: in such cases, everything hinges on the original premise. For McDowell, who was raised in a democratic society, such uniformity comes off as a decisive argument in its favor; as for me, however (a product of Soviet totalitarianism), I actually see this as evidence of a targeted purge of the archives—an everyday occurrence! As an aside: if there’s anything that convinces me of the historical authenticity of the Gospel texts and the lack of revisions made to them later on, it’s precisely the discrepancies and inconsistencies they contain.⁷⁰

2. If we rank Christ’s known appearances by the strength of their supporting evidence, then the aforementioned “appearance to the 500 brethren” should really be at the very bottom of the list. Any student of psychology (or carnival barker, for that matter) can confirm that a crowd of that size can be convinced of just about anything in a pinch—unlike any of its members individually. In social psychology, this is known as “the strengthening of a suggestive effect in group conditions,” or in layman’s terms, “mob mentality”; a prime example of this is the ever-memorable seances of Anatoly Kashpirovsky.⁷¹

⁷⁰ While I came to this conclusion completely independently, I was even more intrigued to find out later that Dmitry Merezhkovsky had already made a similar argument in his aforementioned apologia Jesus the Unknown. (K.E.)

These considerations, incidentally, apply just as strongly to another event that McDowell makes no mention of (and is technically not the subject of our analysis): the Ascension of the Lord. For what it’s worth, note that this episode only appears in the Gospel of Luke (Lk 24:50-52) and Acts of the Apostles (Ac 1:2-11), which is based on the testimony of St. Paul, who did not witness it directly. Neither Matthew, Mark the Evangelist (who records Peter’s account), nor, strangely enough, John—in other words, none of the direct participants in the events—say a single word about the Ascension. Returning to the “appearance on the mountain in Galilee,” I’d like to note that factually speaking, things are nowhere near as clear-cut as McDowell would have them (see below).

Arguments 3 and 4, on the contrary, seem quite reasonable to me. So now, keeping McDowell’s aforementioned considerations in mind, let’s take a closer look at all the times the risen Christ appeared to people who knew him closely. It is quite obvious that the testimony of this group of witnesses holds by far the most weight. We will not touch on Christ’s appearances “one-on-one” to Peter the Apostle and James, Brother of Jesus, as such testimony could hardly be considered convincing in a legal sense, especially since the New Testament gives absolutely no details regarding these appearances. For the purposes of our analysis, our timeline of these appearances (just like McDowell, I consider this factor quite important) will follow Farrar’s.

⁷¹ A popular Russian psychic known for his large-scale demonstrations of his supposed powers. (Z.B.)

1. At dawn on the third day after the execution, when the guards discovered the empty tomb and headed off to inform the high priests, the Myrrhbearers arrived at the burial site. Upon entering the open crypt, they saw “a young man dressed in white clothing”:

And it happened, as they were greatly perplexed about this, that behold, two men stood by them in shining garments. Then, as they were afraid and bowed their faces to the earth, they said to them, “Why do you seek the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen! Remember how He spoke to you when He was still in Galilee, saying, ‘The Son of Man must be [...] crucified, and the third day rise again.’” And they remembered His words.” (Lk 24:4-8)

But the angel answered, [...] “And go quickly and tell His disciples that He is risen from the dead, and indeed He is going before you into Galilee; there you will see Him.” (Mt 28:5-7)

Which the women did.

Thus, the Myrrhbearers’ message regarding Christ’s resurrection is what would legally be termed “hearsay”; in this case, they are merely repeating the words of the “men in shining garments.” Furthermore, the men also have the women pass along a rather practical set of instructions to the disciples: hightail it out of Jerusalem on the double and lay low for a while in their homeland of Galilee. A wise idea, to say the least—over the next few days, things would be quite heated in Jerusalem, as the reaction of the angered and frightened high priests could be considerably harsh. In any case, the Sanhedrin would have a hard time getting their hands on the Apostles in Galilee, a territory that was traditionally hostile to Judeans.

There’s one detail that’s especially worth mentioning here. The Gospel of Matthew claims that Christ himself appeared to the women after their encounter with the angels. This statement (Mt 28:9-10), however, is quite strange for several reasons. The issue here is that the entire scene at the tomb (with the exception of this episode) is a rare case where the narratives of all four Evangelists, including John, line up almost completely; in the case of the Synoptic Gospels, these similarities extend even to the text itself. Could you really imagine that all the Evangelists (except Matthew) forgot to mention an event like this, whose significance needs no elaboration? What's more: the other Gospels effectively provide a direct refutation of Jesus' appearance to the Myrrhbearers (for example, Mk 16:9 and Lk 24:23).

It seems fairly obvious that the testimony of Peter (whose account forms the basis of the Gospel of Mark) and John is more credible in this case—for the simple reason that the two of them, unlike Matthew, were direct participants in the event (see below). It's also worth noting that in the latter's account, the only thing Christ says is "Rejoice," following which he repeats, almost word for word, the angels' previous command to leave for Galilee (compare Mt 28:7 and 28:10). Therefore, we can assume that the frightened women simply took one of the "shining angels" for their teacher; Matthew, meanwhile, who was not a direct witness to the event, did no more than faithfully record their confused account.

2. In fact, the first to discover the empty tomb with the stone cast off was Mary Magdalene, who ran off at once to inform the Apostles. By the time she returned to the burial site, now with Peter and John in tow, the Myrrhbearers had already left. The Apostles examined the crypt, but found nothing more than empty burial shrouds, whereupon they shrugged their shoulders and went back to Jerusalem:

But Mary stood outside by the tomb weeping [...] and she saw two angels in white sitting. [...] Then they said to her, "Woman, why are you weeping?” She said to them, “Because they have taken away my Lord, and I do not know where they have laid Him.” Now when she had said this, she turned around and saw Jesus standing there, and did not know that it was Jesus. Jesus said to her, “Woman, why are you weeping? Whom are you seeking?” She, supposing Him to be the gardener, said to Him, “Sir, if You have carried Him away, tell me where You have laid Him, and I will take Him away.” (Jn 20:11-15)

And only after he makes several attempts at suggestion does she finally realize that the man speaking to her is Jesus himself.

A little strange not to immediately recognize one of your loved ones, don't you think? Okay, fine—grief, shock, the unsteady light of the early morning sun... But here's the interesting part. The angels in the white robes, who were talking with the Myrrhbearers just a short while earlier, disappeared the very moment Mary arrived at the tomb with Peter and John; the angels only turned up again once she was alone. And even when passing on the Teacher's instructions to his Apostles—that they should head to Galilee—the angels, for some reason, opted to use the women as a go-between instead of telling John and Peter directly, even though they were standing literally right there.

3. That same day, two of Christ's disciples, neither of whom were Apostles, were walking to the town of Emmaus:

So it was, while they conversed and reasoned, that Jesus Himself drew near and went with them. But their eyes were restrained, so that they did not know Him. (Lk 24:15-16)

After carrying on a long (and theologically quite important) conversation, the three travelers reached Emmaus, where the disciples invited the stranger to share a meal with them. There, “their eyes were opened, and in spite of his altered appearance, they realized that the Lord was with them.”⁷² Well, I’ll be... What kind of “altered appearance” could he have had for his disciples not to recognize him as their teacher—even while conversing with him at length in broad daylight? What does Mark mean when he says that Christ “appeared in another form” (Mk 16:12)? How, strictly speaking, does it follow that the stranger was Christ? It’s no wonder that the Apostles, who the two disciples proceeded to share their discovery with, were just as skeptical of their account as they were of the women’s a short while earlier.

4. That same evening, ten of the Apostles were gathered inside a locked house to hide from the Judeans. Suddenly, Jesus appeared in the room with them and said, “‘Peace be with you.’ When He had said this, He showed them His hands and His side. Then the disciples were glad when they saw the Lord” (Jn 20:19-20). The Lord was present with them bodily, but in an altered form; the Apostles even believed they were seeing a ghost. To convince them they were dealing with a living person, Jesus invited them to touch him, and concluded his demonstration by eating fish and honey with them. Conveniently absent from this meeting was Thomas—a skeptic who was constantly butting in with questions and doubts. Once he heard his comrades’ story of Christ’s appearance to them, he declared, “Unless I [...] put my finger into the print of the nails, and put my hand into His side, I will not believe” (Jn 20:25).

Looking back over this scene, it’s hard to shake the strange impression that Jesus, in choosing to start his first meeting with the Apostles with a demonstration of his wounds, is using them as... let’s say, a proof of identity. On the other hand, Thomas’ reply also seems pretty strange when you think about it. Why would a normal, non-sadistic person suddenly get the urge to dig his finger into another man's wounds? For what it's worth, it was his reply in this particular episode that earned Thomas ("Twin") his eventual nickname of "Doubting Thomas," and not because he had any uniquely maniacal tendencies towards suspicion in general.

⁷² Aleksandr Lopukhin, Biblical History in the Light of the Latest Research and Discoveries: the New Testament, 1895, pp. 536-537.

Clearly, something in his comrades' story set off a red flag, and I think I've got a pretty good guess of what it was. I'm sure he asked them, "How was our teacher moving?", and once he heard their answer, "Normally, just like everyone else," he knew something was off. Since Christ's Heavenly Father resurrected him in the same body he was crucified in (as confirmed by the nature of his wounds), then that body, in theory, should have behaved accordingly. This raises a rather reasonable question: how genuine could those wounds really be if a man whose ankles had been pierced by nails the size of railroad spikes was walking around like nothing had ever happened?

Hardly any believer could bring himself to throw stones at Thomas—considering that the question of the nature of Christ's body following his resurrection immediately became one of the most pressing problems of theology. In any case, from the lengthy (and frankly, quite tangled) reasoning of St. Paul (1 Cor 15:35-54), we can conclude that it wasn't his directly resurrected earthly body; but if that's the case, why did it still have wounds? It's no surprise Thomas came to a simple, rather rustic solution to this question: "I'll believe it when I feel it."

There's another point here I just can't wrap my head around. Passing through walls and appearing inside a locked room is, without a doubt, a privilege reserved solely for ghosts. But there's no way a spirit can eat fish and honey—which means what we have before us is a being of the material world. It just doesn't add up. I personally have nothing against ghosts (especially those like the Ghost of Hamlet's Father or, say, the murdered samurai from *Rashomon*⁷³), but still, let's try to stay at least minimally consistent here and resist the temptation to change the rules partway into the game. I'm willing to admit that the Evangelist truthfully described his observations, but as for his interpretations of them, I simply can't agree—at least until the two most likely hypotheses (according to “Occam's Razor”) are refuted:

1. The apparition was a wholly material being that lacked any actual supernatural traits.
2. The apparition did not belong to the real world in any of its manifestations, and all of its traits (including its emphatically material ones) were equally illusory.

5. Thomas' wish was granted shortly afterwards, only eight days later. The Apostles, now fully assembled, were gathered once more inside a locked room. Once more, Christ appeared from inside the house, filling the Apostles with awe; after giving them another demonstration of the wounds in his hands and his side, he invited Thomas to touch them. The most interesting part, however, is what happened next. Christian commentators always write that Thomas actually felt the Savior's wounds, following which he became a true believer—once and for all;⁷⁴ here is Gladkov's retelling of the Gospel text:

Suddenly the Lord stood in their midst, and after telling them, “Peace be with you!”, He addressed Thomas: “Take your finger here and see My hands.” Thomas obeyed and felt the wounds of the nails in His hand with his finger. Then the Lord said to him: “Take your finger and place it in My side, and do not be unbelieving.” The Lord uncovered His pierced side, the wound in which was so great that one could fit one’s hand inside it. Thomas, already convinced that the Lord’s hands had been pierced with nails, now stretched his hand out towards the wound in His side, felt it, and falling before Him, exclaimed, “My Lord and my God!”

⁷³ A Japanese film where multiple characters give contradictory accounts of a samurai's murder; the samurai himself posthumously testifies at the trial by way of a psychic. (Z.B.)

⁷⁴ For example, see “Thomas,” Bible Encyclopedia, vol. 4, p. 169. (K.E.)

Now here’s how it looked in reality:

Jesus came, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, “Peace to you!” Then He said to Thomas, “Reach your finger here, and look at My hands; and reach your hand here, and put it into My side. Do not be unbelieving, but believing.” And Thomas answered and said to Him, “My Lord and my God!” (Jn 20:26-28)

That is to say, no “feeling” ever actually took place; Thomas acted the way any normal person would in his position, and his previous promises, as should have been expected, were merely a rhetorical device. All of this could be considered an insignificant detail, of course, if not for one “but.” Recall that Christ appeared before the Apostles “in an altered form”; it was specifically his ability to appear from inside a locked house, as well as the nature of his wounds, that gave the Apostles any grounds to identify the man who appeared before them as Christ. But as for how genuine his wounds really were—as it turns out, no one knew.

6. Some time later, this time in Galilee, seven of the Apostles (which makes me wonder—where did the other four go?) went on a nighttime fishing trip on the Sea of Galilee:

That night they caught nothing. But when the morning had now come, Jesus stood on the shore; yet the disciples did not know that it was Jesus. (Jn 21:3-4)

Following his suggestion, they cast their nets a second time—and this time, it was a smashing success:

Therefore that disciple whom Jesus loved said to Peter, “It is the Lord!” Now when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he put on his outer garment [...] and plunged into the sea. But the other disciples came in the little boat. (Jn 21:7-8)

Waiting for them on the shore was a campfire and a warm meal—baked fish and bread:

Jesus said to them, “Come and eat breakfast.” Yet none of the disciples dared ask Him, “Who are You?”—knowing that it was the Lord. (Jn 21:12)

This was followed by his famous dialogue with Peter: “Tend my sheep.”

Does any of this make sense to you? Well, the fact they’ve failed to recognize their teacher yet again is only half the problem; at this point, I think we’re more than used to it. In this case, however, we’re talking about someone who—irrespective of their previous travels together—they have met twice in the past few days: they have conversed with him, “felt” his wounds, and shared a meal with him. I spent a long time trying to figure out what all of this reminded me of. Then suddenly, it hit me: this is how they teach orphans to call their adoptive father “papa”...

7. Finally, last on Farrar’s list is the “appearance to the 500 disciples and Apostles on the mountain in Galilee.” We have already discussed the inherent value of such collective testimony. Meanwhile, the factual side of the matter is as follows:

Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, to the mountain which Jesus had appointed for them. When they saw Him, they worshiped Him; but some doubted. (Mt 28:16-17)

In short: business as usual.

So let's sum things up. If we appeal to the legal principles that McDowell holds so dear, we are forced to accept the following statement as fact: in none of the episodes we have examined would any court recognize that the risen Christ had been successfully identified by those who knew him closely. This conclusion has, as I see it, two rather unexpected consequences:

1. If Christ's appearances really were the result of individual and collective hallucinations (an explanation highly favored by atheist commentators), then the witnesses would only have been presented with their own impressions of their teacher. In that case, each of them would have seen exactly (and only) what they wanted to see. Take St. Paul, for example (who at that time was still that savage persecutor of Christians, the Pharisee Saul): even though he had never seen Jesus in his life, he still immediately realized who he was talking to. However, the witnesses' clear (albeit somewhat hidden) doubts as to the authenticity of the risen Christ are incontrovertible proof that they were not presented with products of their own memories, but a real person of flesh and blood. Whether or not that man was Christ is another question altogether.

2. I've already taken the opportunity to note that, as I see it, the inconsistencies contained in the Gospel texts actually testify to the latter's authenticity. As it turns out, the Evangelists' mentions of the doubts expressed by the witnesses to these appearances are the clearest case of such a "guarantee by contradiction." It is widely known that the Bodily Resurrection is the most crucial moment for Christianity in the entire story of Jesus of Nazareth:

And if Christ is not risen, then our preaching is empty and your faith is also empty. (1 Cor 15:14)

With this in mind, it stands to reason that it would be precisely this group of “slip-ups” that would vanish from the Gospels after the first targeted “editing” of the text. Any employee of Orwell’s Ministry of Truth who missed a slip-up of this level would surely be vaporized on the spot.

Now let us recall McDowell’s observation regarding the wide variety of circumstances in which these appearances took place (varying numbers of witnesses, varying times of day, etc.). In spite of this, let’s try to find at least something linking all these events together. As it turns out, there really is such a common factor: poor lighting. Appearances 2 and 6 took place in the early morning twilight, and appearances 4 and 5 took place during the evening—in a locked room, no less. Only appearance 3 (on the road to Emmaus) and perhaps appearance 7 (on the mountain in Galilee) took place in broad daylight, but note that it was during these appearances that the issue of identification was most problematic.

In classifying these events, it’s easy to see that the two appearances to the Apostles in Jerusalem clearly stand alone. First, these are the only appearances where the apparition clearly and unambiguously identifies himself. Second, these are the only appearances where he carries clear traces of crucifixion—the characteristic set of wounds. It was obviously these two factors in combination that led witnesses to recognize the risen Christ with a somewhat greater degree of certainty in these appearances than in any of the others.

Moreover—take note!—it is these two appearances that hold the least meaning out of all of them: the Savior appears solely to show his wounds twice over, eat fish and honey, and admonish his disciples for their lack of faith. Conversely, there are only two appearances where Christ makes lengthy speeches on key points of religious dogma: on the road to Emmaus and on the Sea of Galilee. In these cases, as we may recall, the wounds are not present, nor is there a sufficiently high degree of confidence in the identity of the man making these speeches. Speaking of the wounds: they paint an interesting picture. So, he doesn't have them in Emmaus (in what universe could you assume the disciples didn't notice such a "tiny detail" in the hours they spent talking with him?), but then they appear the moment he makes his appearances in Jerusalem—yet by the time he makes his appearances in Galilee, they've vanished without a trace...

Now let's examine the timeline of the appearances from this perspective. The first witnesses are women—grief-stricken, frightened, but nonetheless singularly loyal to their deceased teacher; moreover, most of the explanation for what has happened comes from certain "men in white robes." The next appearance is to two disciples who aren't members of Jesus' inner circle. And only after information regarding these encounters reaches the Apostles, and they become duly prepared for it, does Christ appear to them. But not all of them—it turns out the skeptic Thomas has had his housing rights revoked. And only after this stubborn man's comrades spend a week psychologically conditioning him does the next appearance follow, this time to all eleven Apostles. Moreover, it's hard to shake the impression that during this second appearance, Christ isn't interested in anyone but Thomas. You have to admit that this timeline follows a rather conspicuous pattern: at one end are the people who are the most excitable and suggestible, or know Christ the least, and at the other end are the people who most closely know him and are most capable of independent thought. In addition, each previous rung of the ladder has the ability to psychologically influence the next one.

And yet, when you go over the list of people Christ appeared to, it's missing a certain something—or rather, there's a completely inexplicable gaping hole. Jesus appeared to just about everybody: a pair of disciples from Emmaus who he casually knew, the “500 brethren,” and his clearly unfavored brother James. But there was one person he never once graced with a visit: his own mother.

This is so outrageous that Gladkov concludes his account of the appearances with this magnificent piece of reasoning:

According to legend, Christ made His first appearance to Mary, the Mother of God. While the Evangelists say nothing about this appearance, it is hard to assume [emphasis mine — K.E.] that He would have appeared to the Apostles several times without once gratifying His mother with an appearance, considering how worried He was for Her in His death throes on the cross.

It really is hard to assume such a thing, but ultimately, we are forced to. As for the words “according to legend”: in this context, they sound—well, just like the magical introduction “As we all know” from the ever-memorable “Announcements from TASS.”

Third Warning to McDowell

(Red Card)

So there you have it. We've come to the point in our narrative where Rex Stout gathers all his characters into Nero Wolfe's office so he can unmask the killer—causing an especially emotional reader to cry, “How come I didn't figure that out?!” In accordance with the rules of a classical detective story, the author has no aces hidden up his sleeve; the reader has been provided with every last shred of evidence, to the point where I'm sure many of them have already pieced this puzzle together themselves.

As for the rest, their only option is to acquaint themselves with a certain manuscript, whose authenticity admittedly has yet to be confirmed by experts. For almost twenty centuries, it lay hidden in a sealed jug, which speleologists from Ben-Gurion University recently found by chance while exploring one of the karst caves near Jerusalem. The manuscript's author had actually been summoned from oblivion once before by the sheer power of Bulgakov's genius. As it now turns out, he led an independent existence altogether, surprisingly retaining all the qualities the Master once endowed him with. And so, I yield the floor to the “man who never parted with his hood,”⁷⁵ the chief of the secret service for the procurator of Judea, the military tribune Afranius.⁷⁶

⁷⁵ The Master and Margarita, p. 273

⁷⁶ In his paper “Observations on the Motif Structure of Bulgakov’s Master and Margarita” (Daugava, No. 1, 1989, pp. 78-81), Boris Gasparov appeals to a number of textological arguments to directly identify Afranius with Woland. In his opinion, “chief of the secret police” is nothing more than Satan’s mask in Yershalaim, in the same way that “professor of black magic” serves as his mask in Moscow. However, there are a number of serious objections one can make to such an identification. I, for one, can imagine Woland—Lermontov’s “free son of the ether”—in a variety of different hypostases, but certainly not as a member of the service class; Afranius, meanwhile, speaks quite definitively on this subject: “I have worked in Judea for fifteen years, Procurator. I began my service under Valerius Gratus” (p. 273). From my point of view, Gasparov’s version is interesting mainly as a reflection of modern man’s particular tendency to demonize the secret services. Andrzej Wajda’s postmodern Afranius from Pilate and Others, who has traded out his hood and sword for a pair of shades and a pistol in a shoulder holster, seems far more compelling by comparison. (K.E.)

logo on the top right

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL

IMPERIAL SECRET SERVICE

(JERUSALEM STATION)

The Honorable Vitellius
Proconsul of Syria
Antioch

Proconsul!

Some time ago, I devised and, with the verbal permission of the Procurator of Judea, Pontius Pilate, carried out a secret operation given the codename of FISH. At present, this operation can be considered successfully completed; I would even say too successfully, for if news of its progress and results were to reach Rome, both of us would surely lose our heads. Likewise, there is no doubt that the leaking of any information regarding FISH were it to happen within the next two or three years would have objectively catastrophic consequences for the Eastern policy of the Empire. Putting myself in the Procurators place, I am forced to admit: the situation is so serious, the best possible outcome would entail the sudden death of the initiator and direct supervisor of the operation. As you can easily guess, however, I have a dissenting opinion on this matter, and I intend to defend it by all the means I have at my disposal.

The Procurator has already been informed of the existence of a detailed account of the operation, which, in the event of my untimely death or arrest, will immediately fall into the hands of interested parties. Your receipt of this document, Proconsul, means that the Hegemon has failed to heed my warning, and I am already deadstabbed by Jewish terrorists, poisoned by stale oysters, or executed as a spy for the Parthians, the Indians, or the Atlanteans. If the Procurator acts wisely, however, then this document will never leave its hiding place in the outskirts of Jerusalem. The way I see it, the foregoing circumstances exempt me from the typical degrading oaths to tell the truth, the whole truth, and so on: a dead man has no reason to lie

About three years ago, our agency carried out Operation CENTAURthe mass infiltration of Zealot organizations in Galilee, which had utterly exploded in number over the past few years. Among those sent to Galilee was Special Agent Demiurge. A Judean by origin, his cover story called for him to act under the name Judas ben Simon, a native of the backwater village of Kerioth; this minimized the risk of him running into one of his fellow countrymen while out on a mission.

Judas (as we will call him) was initially tasked with joining the social circle of one of Galilees wandering preachers, which is by no means difficult. Once he had built a solid relationship with some radicals (who all these sects are literally teeming with) and secured the proper credentials, he was to proceed to the next phase of the operation; this time, he would be directly infiltrating the Zealots clandestine networks. From this point on, Judas was to cut off all contact with our Galilee Station, as the Zealots security service was quite vigilant and rather competent.

Acting completely autonomously, he was to work to gain authority for himself among the extremists in Galileefor a year, two years, or however long it might take. In these types of infiltrations, there is no fooling around: Judas, in particular, was authorized to commit terrorist acts against members of the local and, if absolutely necessary, the imperial military administration.

Once he had reached a sufficiently high rank in the underground hierarchy, he was to carefully and gently persuade the organizations leadership that it would be foolish not to make some use of his knowledge of the situation in Judea, or of his vast array of contacts there. Ultimately, Judas was to return to his homeland with the necessary authority to organize a permanent channel of communication between the Galilean and Judean Zealot organizations, and, in the long run, become the coordinator of their joint activities. We found this goal so important that we ordered Judas not to let himself get distracted by any other opportunities, even the most tempting ones (for example, infiltrating the Zealots security service). For the initial infiltration, we chose more or less at random a sect based in Capernaum, which was led by a certain Yeshua Ha-Notsri.

As you can see, this mission was quite a difficult one, but I placed the chances of success at about two-to-one. Demiurge was the best native agent I had ever worked with—determined, cool-headed, and incredibly successful. He was exceptionally well-trained on a technical level (with skills in conducting and evading surveillance, disguise, the use of caches and communication systems, and both armed and hand-to-hand combat), but more importantly, he had the natural ability to win practically anyone over to him almost immediately. He began his service on the Parthian border, in the native auxiliary units of the Special Forces. The man was bold, diabolically cunning, but most of all, he had no fear of blood; as a result, we soon started using him as a penetrator (an agent who leads raids) in reconnaissance and sabotage operations behind enemy lines. Typically, the life of a penetrator is as short as his Syrian sword, but Demiurge caught a lucky break. One day, he had the opportunity to give me a demonstration of his artistic talent, and he did not miss his chance. From that day forward, we began using him exclusively to infiltrate radical groups in Judea; after five years, Proconsul, I can hardly even count the extremists whose lives were lost to Demiurges wondrous charm.

Thats not to say he was completely free of flawsthough on the other hand, you could hardly call it a flaw Basically, Demiurge made no secret of the fact that he was in it solely for the money, and the day he saved up enough to start a large business (under a new name) somewhere in Cyprus or Alexandria would be the last day of our partnership. Personally, I was quite pleased with his candor regarding our relationship. Like any intelligence man, I cant stand the people who come to join our agency for ideological reasons: without fail, they always end up picking the worst possible moment to throw a tantrum or give us the Vestal Virgin routine. But Demiurge was in it for the money, and I can assure you he earned every denarius of his salary, and even more. His salary, for what its worth, was almost as much as that of a city council clerk, though it came with a slightly different workload, of course: the bodies of agents who have fallen into the hands of the Zealots security service are typically not a sight for the faint of heart In short, Demiurge loved money, knew his worth as a professional, andhonestly, not without good reasonbelieved we werent paying him enough.

As I looked over the status updates from the first phase of Operation CENTAUR, I came across Judas/Demiurges unremarkable report. He wrote that hed run into an annoying snag from the very get-go. While there really were quite a few Zealots in Ha-Notsris sect, all of themapparently inspired by their teachers sermonshad cut ties with their previous organizations, and were no longer of any operational interest. Given these circumstances, Judas requested permission to leave Ha-Notsri behind and look for another sect to infiltrate.

My old friend Polycleitus of Antiocha fantastic sculptor and inveterate drunkonce gave me a wonderful description of the state an artist finds himself in when the thing youve been racking your brain over for weeks on end finally arrives in your mind fully formed, down to the very last detail. Well, my Artemis is almost finished; all I have to do now is sculpt it! No, Im completely serious. Its just that the gods have done their share of the work, and now its up to me to handle the rest! A similar feeling washed over me as I pored over the lines of Judas report. I realized that this was the message Id been waiting several years forever since the moment my minds eye first made out the hazy contour of a grandiose secret operation that, for the greater glory of Caesar and the Empire, could very well change the entire political landscape of Palestine. Well, it looked like the gods had done their share; now it was time for me to get to work.

I dug up all the files our agency had on Yeshua and his sect, but when it came to the information I was looking for, it soon became clear that none of these dossiers were worth the papyrus they were written on. I had no other option than to head out to Galilee myself, disguised as a Greek merchant from the Decapolis. The risk, of course, was considerable (Herods secret police were no less itching to have a little chat with me than the Zealots security service), but I couldnt entrust this task to any of my subordinates for reasons of secrecy. I went so far as to bring along some operatives from the Samaria Station for protection; their superiors had no clue as to the nature of my mission. After spending five days on site studying the environment around the sect, listening to its leaders sermons, and even getting the chance to talk with him personally, I was convinced Id made the right choice. Upon my return to Jerusalem, I submitted a top-secret report to the Procurator, following which I pulled Judas out of Operation CENTAUR, placed him under my direct authority, and granted him access to our agencys most secure lines of communication and supply in Galilee. Thus began Operation FISH.

I need not explain to you, Proconsul, how our many attempts over the years to stabilize the situation in Palestine, and incorporate that haughty, quarrelsome people into the Empire through normal means, have been purely palliative in nature. Of course, we could keep methodically catching and hanging terrorists one-by-one, by the dozen, by the hundred if we need to but surely you'll agree that it would be like scooping out water with a sieve. The atmosphere of nationalistic psychosis and religious fanaticism that the country's spiritual fathers have created will only continue to spawn extremists as steadily as a swamp's miasma produces fever. Special rights for God's chosen people is a brilliant cause for Sadducee pragmatists, orthodox Pharisees, and political radicals of all stripes to rally behind. The local elite consists of a small number of intellectuals who are oriented towards liberal cosmopolitan values, though their political influence is scant, and unlikely to grow in the foreseeable future. Moreover, many of them have been compromised by their active collaboration with the Hellenized (and therefore highly unpopular) Idumean dynasty.

As I shuffled back and forth through this gloomy game of solitaire, I realized that this was our one and only chance to finally break out of our defensive crouch. It called for an influential religious leader to appear on the political scene of Palestine—a leader who would preach against violence and transform the Jews (sad to say, Proconsul) natural resistance to Caesar's authority into a solely ideological and moral conflict. By no means could he have any ties to the political establishment, whom the people believed (not entirely justly) to be deep in Rome's pocket; the most logical place to look for such a figure would be among sectarians and wandering preachers.

With time, he could become the true spiritual leader of the nation, or even—who knows?—the head of an official church; however, this outcome was unlikely, and not worth seriously counting on. But there was another very real possibility: after his preaching eventually brought him into conflict with the Jewish orthodoxy, the new prophet assuming he was of sufficiently high popularity would split the Jews religiously monolithic society in two. In the future, we would have the opportunity to carefully deepen the resulting divide, as well as serve as an arbitrator in the inevitable interdenominational disputes.

It was clear that we would have to provide this leader with dedicated support; it was also clear that this support would have to be kept completely secret, for danger surrounded us on quite literally all sides. Judge for yourself, Proconsul. First, the official Jewish authorities: without a doubt, they would see any attempt at propping up a dissident sectarian as blatant perfidy on the part of Rome, and react accordingly. Second, the Zealots: the moment they heard some preacher was enjoying the special favor of the Roman authorities, they would slit his throat without even a word. Third, higher administration and the Imperial Court: you can quite easily imagine, Proconsul, how Rome and Capri would take to us offering practical assistance to subversive elements we'd be lucky if they didn't consider it out-and-out treason. Last but not least: we would have to provide this assistance in such a way that not even the religious leader himself could begin to suspect that he was just a pawn in someone's game or else the whole operation would immediately go down in flames. In our professional jargon, this is called playing face-down one of the most complex types of operational schemes.

To be honest, it was the last problem that worried me the most when I placed my final bet on Yeshua a man who was nothing but honest, yet also (a rare combination!) quite discerning. However, I managed to find a fundamental solution to this relatively quickly, and promptly gave the relevant instructions to Judas. After three months, he reported that his mission was a success: he was now the keeper of the community's money box and its de facto financial administrator. The problem of establishing a permanent funding channel had now been solved.

As for Judas, he was now forced to take on the rather unusual role of a guardian angel. From this moment on, he was charged with resolving the community's domestic and monetary disputes, as well as protecting it from agents of the Judean secret police. Most of all, however, his life was staked on Yeshua's personal safety (with time, the Zealots or high priests might come to understand his teachings and organize an assassination attempt). However, there was another delicate task Judas was entrusted with: if, out of nowhere, Ha-Notsri were to suddenly start calling for a holy war against the Roman occupiers, he was to be immediately liquidated.

In any case, Judas gradually rose to the rank of second-in-command in the community, to the point where he controlled virtually all day-to-day aspects of its operation. He had a lot on his plate outside the sect, as well; in actively working to shape public opinion, he not only spread fantastic rumors, but also took it upon himself to stage a wide variety of miracles. For what its worth, it was mock healings (which Judas organized in abundance) that constituted the single largest expense item in the budget for Operation FISH.

Meanwhile, the operation was coming along swimmingly. Yeshua's popularity swiftly grew, and in the span of just three years, he legitimately became one of the most influential religious leaders in all of Palestine. Moreover, the discrepancies between his teachings and classical Judaism quickly began to deepen, and I looked on in amazement as a new religious doctrine was born before my very eyes—a doctrine, Proconsul, that was everything I hoped for and more! The high priests, on the other hand, had clearly failed to see the danger he posed to them, and irrevocably missed their chance to smother their rival in his crib. Now there was little else they could do other than stage a riot every time Ha-Notsri visited the city, or simply try to arrest him. They went about this extremely clumsily, though, which naturally only served to strengthen Yeshuas popularity. Yeshua, however, was more than keen to return the favor (just imagine how much it cost us each time he scattered the money changers from the Temple!), so his pilgrimages to Jerusalem ended up being a constant headache for our agency. On one occasion, the situation was so tense that we were forced to organize an emergency evacuationthank Jupiter he never realized how he escaped the city.

Yeshuas growing popularity had another consequence I had failed to foresee: he had now made the acquaintance of several members of the liberal wing of the Sanhedrin. I was not at all excited to learn of this development. The problem was that these liberals were a separate concern of mine altogether (weak as they were, they nonetheless served as a counterweight to the hawks in the Judean leadership); now that they were in touch with Ha-Notsri, however, I started to fear I had put all my eggs in one basket. But after weighing the pros and cons, I decided to take a calculated risk and make no attempt to prevent these spontaneous contacts; Yeshua and Nicodemus were political figures, after all, not secret agents. For starters, these connections could yield rather interesting effects somewhere down the road. Furthermore, in case of emergency, I now had the ability to offer assistance to Ha-Notsri on the supposed behalf of a powerful group of Judeans, which would allow us to avoid unwanted questions; this, for example, was exactly how we presented the aforementioned evacuation to him.

Unfortunately, we ran into another serious complication. At that time, there was another prophet preaching in Judeaa man named John, nicknamed the Baptist. A fundamentalist whose piety eclipsed even that of the Pharisees, he was enormously popular among the common people, while the Judean authorities regarded him with a wary respect. And so for some time, we looked on as an unprecedented experiment, staged by life itself, unfolded on the banks of the River Jordan the parallel preaching of two powerful religious leaders. Alas! It became clear almost immediately that we were completely outmatched; the Judeans were far more attracted to the fierce, accusatory manner of their fellow countryman.

As you can imagine, a rivalry immediately broke out between the two sects. And while Yeshua and John still found it necessary to maintain a sense of decorum, their disciples merely sought any opportunity they could to duke it out in their Rabbis honor, influencing the rest of their flock accordingly. It was clear as day that these events would only intensify in the immediate future, and their competition would escalate into an open confrontation a confrontation that Yeshua stood no chance of winning. We had no other option than to interfere with the natural course of events and isolate John; he had been a thorn in our side for quite some time now, actually, but it was extremely hard to get our hands on him.

As for arresting the Baptist in the name of Caesar and swiftly executing him for anti-Roman propaganda, that was out of the question: such international aid would leave Yeshua marked with a stain that would last him the rest of his life. Getting the Sanhedrin to convict John was practically impossible: the Pharisees were openly sympathetic to him, while the Sadducees were afraid to get involved and any attempt to exert pressure on them through the Procurator would simply bring us back to square one. Furthermore, the Procurator himself had categorically refused to let us even temporarily detain the prophet on his territory, fearing quite justifiably that it would cause mass unrest. We could organize an assassination attempt with little problem, but, as I knew all too well, the Baptist had quite a few secret admirers in Judeas police and intelligence services, who were more than capable of conducting an independent investigation.

The situation on the Jordan was evolving literally by the day, but then, as luck would have it, I received an order from the Procurator to travel to Galilee on a diplomatic mission. Right then was when it dawned on me; as the saying goes, every cloud has a silver lining. After leaving the necessary instructions with my assistant, I set out that very same day for Tiberias. During the course of the negotiations, I declared to Herod that we were well and truly fed up with the Galilean leaderships promises (Right after dinner!)⁷⁷ to suppress the terrorist activities of the local Zealot factions: We fully understand that all of Galilees armed forces are currently occupied in the border conflict with King Aretas of Arabia. As such, I am authorized to announce that Rome is willing to make concessions to the local authorities and provide them with emergency international aid to help rid the territory of armed gangs; two cohorts of Special Forces have already been prepared for redeployment, and can enter service as soon as today.

Herod quite reasonably objected that the Roman authorities would do well to put their own house in order first in Judea. Never in his life, for example, would he tolerate having Eleazars army of bandits on his territory, or for that matter, subversive propaganda, which the Sanhedrin and the Roman procurator allowed the notorious John the Baptist to spread with total impunity. Following this, the Tetrarch, as expected, began to profess a litany of desires regarding the Baptists fate, both in this life and the next (as that brilliant orator had long made Herod the main target of his denunciations).

⁷⁷ The Master and Margarita, p. 249.

After sending an emergency dispatch to Jerusalem, I spent the next three days in a state of forced idleness. Every so often, I held pointless consultations with local police officials (none of whom had even heard the word Zealot in their lives), but for the most part, I took my fill of the local wine and Herods court dancers. The wine was too tart for my plebeian palate; the girls, on the other hand, were nothing short of delightful, and their caresses exquisite if only they didnt keep trying to start those conversations. It seemed like I had gotten what I wanted, and my colleagues in Galilee had really taken me for a sap. On the third night, I received the coded message I was waiting for and went to see Herod again in the morning.

Beaming from ear to ear, I informed him that the Roman leadership had duly noted the desire expressed by the Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea in our previous talk, and had undertaken a gesture of goodwill. Last night, the notorious John the Baptist had been captured and transported to the territory of Perea, to the remote frontline fortress of Machaerus. Thus, the man who had insulted Herod for so long had been delivered straight to him, wrapped up in a bow, and the Tetrarch was free to do with him as he pleased. Would His Highness see it fit to return to the question of whether Roman Special Forces might immediately begin carrying out counterinsurgency operations on Galilean territory?

I diplomatically neglected to mention that the arrest team had been dressed in Galilean police uniforms, a tactic that had quite frankly served to mislead the garrison at Machaerus, which consisted mainly of Greeks from the Decapolis. But Herod had already heard enough. After taking a moment to pick up his jaw from the floor, he shouted, So youve decided to pin this on me?! Each and every one of you can go fuck yourselves! All I could do was throw up my hands in bemusement (Aw, fiddlesticks, you tried your best) and wait till he came to his sense.

But like it or not, the Tetrarchs hands were tied. In cases like this, the horse has already left the barn: its no trouble at all to put a man in prison, but letting him out again is damn near impossible. Either you admit you made a mistake, or you leave behind a record of your impotence; its best to be rid of him altogether, for as they say, no manno problem! (And even if Herod lost his senses and freed John anyway, we would make damn well sure he didnt get far past the gates of Machaerus.) Eventually, the Tetrarch pulled himself together and firmly stated, A clever tricktwo birds with one stone! But mark my words, tribune: a little stunt like that isnt going to work on me. If its a bargain you want, name your real price. The negotiations that followed proved rather constructive.

Some time later, after the Judean publics initial furor at the Baptists arrest had died down, he was quietly beheaded, and little by little, we began working to shape public opinion, spreading two stories about the affair. In the first, we tried to vindicate Herod as much as possible and placed the lions share of the blame on Herodias, whose reputation was so poor it was impossible to harm any further. In the second (the more important of the two), we convinced everyone that John the Baptist had actually recognized Yeshua as the Messiah, and generally considered himself unworthy to untie the straps of his sandals. This was the first of several active measures campaigns carried out during the course of Operation FISH; all of them were quite successful.

Thus, we had full reason to expect that in five to six years, our efforts would bear fruit, and we would finally have the third force in Palestine that we so desperately needed to rely on. Everything was going so smoothly that I brushed aside the first alarm bell, which had gone off about half a year prior. One day, one of the disciples absent-mindedly stuck his hand inside the money box andas luck would have itstumbled upon a pile of silver that Judas had secreted there just the day before. The community demanded an explanation and naturally, they got one quantum satis. Judas, like any seasoned business owner, had no trouble pulling the wool over the eyes of his financially illiterate brothers in faith, especially since the issue at hand wasn't a deficit, but a surplus. Yeshua, however, was clearly left unsatisfied by his explanations. He seemed to suspect that his minister of finance had been running a side business in the community's name perhaps he'd started charging money for cures or something. Judas made a titanic effort to regain his teacher's trust, but by all appearances, he was never able to restore the status quo.

And then came a catastrophe, the seed for which, as it later turned out, I had actually laid with my own two hands. That spring, Yeshua went on his customary Passover pilgrimage to Jerusalem. I still have no clue what led me to come up with such a strange idea: slipping in two genuine, honest-to-God paralytics for him to heal. Say what you will, Proconsul, but they stood up and walked. I'd often heard stories of Eastern mages performing such tricks, but to be honest, I'd never believed a word of it (for our agency works even greater miracles from time to time). Here, however, I had no leg to stand on I'd picked those paralytics out myself. Of course, the Pharisees had always claimed that Ha-Notsri was healing people for real, albeit with the power of Beelzebub. So what if he was? I'm a detective, not a priest, and I could hardly give a damn where his cures were coming from; all I cared about was whether or not I was being had. The problem was this: on Judas expense report, both my paralytics were listed on the same line as all the other mock healings. My mind went back to all the money we'd sunk into staging the miracles in Galilee; what if the cures Yeshua performed there (or at least part of them) were also completely genuine?

I called Judas over to the safehouse and politely asked for his thoughts on the story of my paralytics. He immediately realized where I was going with this; at first, he tried playing the fool (just like that, you see, hed forgotten who the accounts were paid out to), then changed tactics and started trying to sell me on a riveting story that hed clearly made up on the spot. Supposedly, he had put all the missing money into a spectacular miracle that would take place just a few days from now in the outskirts of Jerusalem. All in all, the diagnosis was clear: a guy being paid chicken feed had gone mad contemplating the stream of silver flowing through his hands. I needed to take him out of the operation at once and put him before a tribunal for embezzling state funds. Had I done so, Proconsul, the operation could have proceeded more or less of its own accord, and Judas, for what its worth, would still be alive. But alas! Ignoring my gut and thinking back to the mans impeccable service record, I decided on my own responsibility to give him a chance to redeem himself. Judas wound up using this chance quite brilliantly: after getting too mixed up for his own good and completely tanking the operation, he saw nothing better to do than to betray everyone around him. He killed Ha-Notsri, got himself killed, and, presumably for want of company, killed me along with him. So it goes.

A week or so later, however, the bazaars of Jerusalem were abuzz with rumors that a great miracle had taken place in the village of Bethany (which is on the Mount of Olives). Yeshua Ha-Notsri, in the presence of dozens of witnesses, had returned to life a well-known and well-respected man by the name of Lazarus, who had died some four days earlier. I breathed a sigh of relief, but, as it later turned out, it was entirely in vain, for it was at this very moment that the entire operation began its slow plunge into the abyss.

Later on, of course, I conducted a thorough investigation and discovered that Judas, as I should have expected, let greed get the better of him. Everything would have gone just fine had he hired an appropriate number of crooks to witness his miracle and honestly paid them for their work (which was how I personally thought he went about it). Judas, however, found it vitally necessary to cover for the money he had embezzled; as a result, he decided to economize and bring in honest people as witnesses, reckoning quite rightly that they would do the work for free. All of Lazarus immediate family were ardent supporters of Yeshua; I don't think Judas had a hard time trying to convince them to take part in the deception for the noblest of causes, of course especially since he had a simply marvelous way of working with women. Unfortunately, things played out almost like an Aesop's fable, and Judas' greed came back to bite him: he somehow failed to realize that honest people are the ones most likely to stab you in the back.

Which is exactly what happened. The disciples realized almost immediately that they had been conned, and shunned Lazarus' family entirely. His sisters took it quite hard, and eventually asked Judas to stand up for them before their fellow believers and take his share of the blame. Judas realized he was at imminent risk for expulsion from the community, which would be utterly catastrophic for him. To the victor go the spoils, but a failed agent could hardly count on any leniency during the inevitable financial audit. For a while, he managed to wriggle his way out of it and put off the decisive conversation, but on the Night of the Spilled Myrrh, the sisters gave Judas an ultimatum: either he would inform the community of his role in Lazarus' resurrection, or they would do it for him. Judas knew it was all over, and it was time to call it quits; he left the meal and headed straight for the high priest Caiaphas.

Yes, it was him, Judas of Kerioth, longtime associate of the notorious Yeshua Ha-Notsri. Now, however, the scales had fallen from his eyes; he had come to realize that this Galilean rabble-rouser, knowing not what he was doing, would lead the Jewish people to rebellion and spill its blood upon the Romans' swords. Oh, yes, it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and not that the whole nation should perishwonderfully said, Your Holiness, was that one of the ancient prophets? All you?! Truly happy is the people that has such men for shepherds! Well, of course, youd have to be completely insane to arrange a public trialyou'd be up to your ears in shit no matter what the outcome. Though between the arrest and the trial, a man can run into all sorts of surprises; and even the arrest itself how should I put this opens up a sea of possibilitieslike an escape attempt, for instance. In Jerusalem, right there on the street, no, of course you cantwhy, you ask? I mean, he and his associates have a habit of spending the night outside the city, in quiet and solitude. Where do they stay? Oh, come on, do you think Im just going to give you everything on a silver platter? All you have to do, Your Holiness, is put a bunch of your guys on guard duty every night, and Ill take care of the rest; yes, a few days, I think, well get it done by Passover. Just be on the lookouteven in the Sanhedrin youve got some active yep, thats exactly it. No, I dont need any money. Nope, wrong again: Im not trying to play hide and seek hereon the contrary, I would like to have the official recognition of the Sanhedrin; oh, and also some protectionpurely nominal, just for the week

Of course, that wasnt necessarily how it went verbatim, but Im positive that was the gist of it. And honestly, I have to hand it to him: the scoundrel managed to find the only loophole thatin the best-case scenariowould have allowed him to get off scot-free. Judge for yourself, Proconsul.

So just what options did Judas have? He could give up completely (Whatever happens, happens) and hopelessly await his trial and imprisonment for embezzlement, but of course, we can rule that out immediately: that just wasnt the type of man he was. A more obvious choice would be to quietly take his leave, scrounge up all the money hed saved, and vanish into the bustling metropolises of the Near East. Unfortunately, that also didnt work: our agency hates such jokes with a passion. Spending the rest of his life on the Empires Most Wanted, forever moving from cheap hotel to cheap hotel, jumping at the sight of his own shadowhow, in essence, was this any better than going with the first option and spending a few years in prison? In theory, he had another, more exotic option: he could disappear into the Zealot underground and start a career as a religious fanatic and noble terrorist. In that case, as you can easily guess, we would find a way of providing the Zealots security service with our ample records of Judas previous exploits in the field of counterterrorism.

Of course, Judas could flee to territory in the Parthians sphere of influence, but there he would have his own share of problems. The entirety of the Euphrates border region is monitored extremely closely by Parthian counterintelligence; try to live there illegally, and before you know it, youll be getting impaled as an active Roman agent, which is just a stupid way to go. He could still turn himself in preemptively; in that case, the defector would be subjected to a lengthy, grueling process of verification. I would be quite pessimistic as to Judas chances of passing it: unfortunately for him, his actual backstory sounded exactly like a typical cover story for an infiltration.

Still, lets suppose the defector managed to convince the investigators of his sincerity and was spared execution. Do you really think that would be the end of his troubles (in other words, the truth would set him free)? Not on your life! Theyd just send him back to Palestine with the next group of spies, on an incredibly dangerous or bloody mission to boot (for example, as a so-called expendable agent⁷⁸ spreading disinformation). The stuff of dreams, isnt it? However, all these Parthian scenarios are pure speculation. I say this due to the nature of the operations Judas took part in on the Parthian border, back at the start of his career as the Special Forces officer Demiurge. Some of them left such a vivid impression that, if I were in Judas shoes, I would only risk going back there had I failed to find shelter in any other corner of the Ecumene, including the mouth of Vesuvius

⁷⁸ A term borrowed from Sun Tzus The Art of War. (Z.B.)

And so, Proconsul, weve narrowed it down to the only party in this situation that contingent on several conditions could possibly guarantee Judas safety, namely: the official Judean authorities. What bargaining chip did Judas have to offer them, though? While the high priests loathed Yeshua with every fiber of their being, they were clearly afraid to put him on trial otherwise, they would have arrested him on the streets of Jerusalem ages ago. Judas, on the other hand, was setting out to organize his teachers liquidation, and his membership in Yeshuas community gave him certain opportunities he could use to his advantage mainly, his knowledge of where Ha-Notsri spent the night outside the city. This was information that the Sanhedrin genuinely couldnt get anywhere else, for which reason they were forced to meet Judas on his own terms.

His terms were as follows: Judas would present himself to the high priests as one of Yeshuas associates, taking great pains to hide his second identity as a Roman agent; once the deed was done, however, it was absolutely vital that Judas appear before the Roman authorities as an official representative of the Sanhedrin. Of course, with Judas skills and experience, he could quite easily liquidate his teacher by himself, but who would have any use for him then? Without a doubt, the Sanhedrin would immediately distance themselves from the whole sordid affair, writing it off as the bloody infighting of some thuggish Galilean sect. As a result, Judas needed to make sure that both high contracting parties had blood on their hands.

If he succeeded, then Judas would bring our game to a stalemate that would ultimately end up saving him. We couldnt arrest Judas for embezzlement without revealing his role in Operation FISH to the Judean authorities; you can easily imagine the kind of scandal that would cause. Of course, we could liquidate the traitor some time later, but what for? It was in his best interest, even more so than for us, to keep his work for us (especially on FISH) a secret till his dying day. It wouldnt bring back Yeshua, and it wouldnt restart the operation; it would be nothing more than revenge, which, contrary to popular belief, is not in the tradition of the intelligence services. Whats more: even if Judas suddenly got it into his head to blurt out the truth about FISH, we would publicly recommend that he see a psychiatrist, and that would be that. Killing him, on the other hand, would be marking his claim with a reference number and stamping it with an imperial seal. And as for revenge: from that moment on, of course, Judas would have the Zealots to worry about, but like they say, better the devil you know. In short, Proconsul, had things turned out the way Judas planned them, we really would have had to leave him alone.

However, he could only consider himself safe once he had carried out his scheme in full. If at any point before then, our agency learned of his contact with the Sanhedrin, his life wouldnt be worth a rotten olive. At the same time, Judas knew full well that the truth would come out eventually (in an organization like the Sanhedrin, information leaks almost instantaneously), and since it was only a matter of days until it did, he decided to give himself a running start. In a situation like this, the optimal strategy is to lead ones opponents on a false trail that will waste them precious time.

Immediately after his meeting with the high priests, he called an emergency meeting with me (which also gave him a cover story for his presence in the city) and informed me that one of the members of the sect, namely John, had been acting quite strange over the past few days. He, Judas, suspected that he was looking to get in contact with the Sanhedrin, and requested that our agency immediately start making inquiries into the matter. Judas based his calculations on the fact that he bore a significant physical resemblance to John; moreover, while leaving Lazarus house, he accidentally put on Johns cloak instead of his own. This, as he rightly believed, would be enough to prevent our informants in the Sanhedrin, none of whom had ever met them both, from being able to state with certainty that Caiaphas visitor was not John.

Thus, as soon as we received any information from the Sanhedrin (One of Ha-Notsris followers did stop by, actually just over three cubits blue cloak), which was inevitable regardless, all the details would line up with Judas preemptive report. This would provide the perfect cover for Judas at least for the first few days, but that was all he needed As a final flourish (might as well be hanged for a sheep as for a lamb), Judas requested another hefty sum of money in case he needed to evacuate the disciples, pay off some guards, or take any other measures to mitigate the consequences of a potential betrayal; I saw no reason not to give it to him.

Theres no debating that this was a brilliant move on Judas part. And yet, I hardly would have fallen for it had I been in normal working order. Unfortunately, at some stage of the operation, everything had started to turn against us. While Judas was giving his report, my mind was occupied with another thing entirely: a catastrophic, bloody failure at the Galilee Station. I had spent the previous week working on site to contain the damage, evacuating those who could still be saved and liquidating those who couldnt. But it was all in vain our spy ring in Galilee only continued to crumble, like a sandcastle baking in the hot sun. The whole time, I only managed to get in a few hours of sleep, so the gears of my mind were turning with a deafening crunch. As soon as our informants in the Sanhedrin gave me the first confirmation of Judas warning, I swallowed the bait and went about organizing the liquidation of the traitor that is, John.

However, we had to proceed with the utmost caution. As a rule, the members of the sect walked the streets of Jerusalem in a single group, closely monitored for their own protection by Judean surveillance agents; thus, it was impossible to approach John undetected. If absolutely necessary, of course, we could move in regardless: perhaps we could organize a minor street riot and use the commotion to quietly jab an awl under the traitors shoulder blades, or perhaps we could have some snipers from the Special Forces shoot him with a poisoned arrow from 200 cubits away. If the hit was carried out too professionally, though, Judean detectives would quite easily be able to sniff out the Roman trail, which would inevitably lead them to the correct (and extremely undesirable) conclusion; besides that, it would cause a panic in the sect itself. Ultimately, however, we still had no particular cause for concern: Yeshuas preaching, and his activity in general, were anything but private, and this wannabe stool pigeon was simply no match for an agent of Judas caliber. The most sensible course of action here was to widen our web and wait patiently; we would keep a close eye on the sect itself and monitor the places where the turncoat was most likely to appear namely, the approaches to the Sanhedrin, Caiaphas house, and the Temple Guards headquarters. We would have no trouble trailing an amateur like John; sooner or later, he would have to leave his comrades behind and travel alone to a secret rendezvous and that would be the moment he'd get stabbed by robbers.

I do not know how mighty is John's God, Proconsul, but at the very least, he was able to save the life of his follower at no point over the next few days did he let him break away from his fellow believers. It was only in the early hours of Thursday, 13 Nisan, that one of our surveillance units finally recorded John's appearance in the city; once again, however, he was not alone, but came accompanied by another disciple, Peter. After entering one of the houses in the Lower City and staying there for about half an hour, they left Jerusalem through the Sheep Gate in the Eastern Wall and began heading toward the Mount of Olives. At that hour, the Jericho Road was completely empty, so it was impossible to conduct any further surveillance. Back in Jerusalem, however, our operatives spotted a man coming out of the house that John and Peter had left just minutes before; they proceeded to follow him until he reached his final destination, the house of Nicodemus, one of the leaders of the liberal faction of the Sanhedrin.

At this point, I was well and truly alarmed. At least now I had an idea of what Caiaphas was aiming for, namely, why the hell he needed to plant an informant in a sect that was operating completely out in the open. It seemed the High Priest was using John as an agent provocateur; with his help, he had finally realized his dream of a Yeshua-Nicodemus Conspiracy, which would leave Caiaphas and Annas free to wring the necks of their opposition in the Sanhedrin. The role of Peter in all of this still remained to be seen, but I had a bigger mystery on my hands. It was now six days since I last heard from Judas why the hell hadn't he told me about any of these contacts? All of that could wait till later, though. Right now, I needed to save Yeshua and Nicodemus, and fast—the time had long since passed for any complex, multistep schemes.

After that morning, Nicodemus spent some time talking with his old friend Gaius Fabricius, who now marked his twelfth straight year in the useless position of Cultural Advisor to the Administration of the Procurators of Judea. A refined, sardonic intellectual forever poisoned by the East's insidious charms, the advisor rooted himself into this rocky soil like the Calabrian pines Phoenician colonists once brought over to our native Italy. He had first made Nicodemus acquaintances about ten years ago, when he enlisted his help in interpreting some mystical Babylonian texts. Their acquaintance later grew into a friendship (to the degree that such is possible between a devout Jew and a pagan) that opened Fabricius eyes to the somber beauty of the Jewish faith especially its captivating picture of a Universe organized as a unified whole by a fearsome, immaterial Godhead. A few years ago at the instigation of the very same Nicodemus he developed a serious interest in the teachings of a certain Galilean prophet, and, if I recall correctly, even managed to have a brief conversation with him. In short, the advisor gained a reputation among his fellow officials as an out-and-out Judeophile; naturally, he was the target of a full half of the denunciations our agency received from his colleagues.

In my interactions with him over the years, a terrifying thought would sometimes cross my mind: just who (or what) was the Undeclared Station Chief for the Central Intelligence Directorate, General Staff Centurion Gaius Fabricius, really serving? And then it hit me: this cynical, sarcastic man, whose head would have rolled ages ago for lèse majesté were he living in Rome, was serving at his own peril and risk the idea of a vast, worldwide Empire. An Empire that would merge the crystalline logic of the West with the vague, unerring intuition of the East; the glory of victorious legions with the wisdom of millennia-old papyruses; the chiseled-out formulas of Roman law with the hazy, unquestionable revelations of an impersonal, incorporeal God. An Empire that would forge the copper of Europe and the tin of Asia to form a black bronze that neither the elements nor the ages could weather.

Of course, it would be ridiculous to think a man like him could seriously buy into empty propaganda like the historical mission of Rome. Fabricius was merely bored, and had a constant need for harder and harder problems to solve, like a junkie to his fix. And in this grandiose game of chess he devised, where he was to play white against the entire world order as it currently existed, the centurion clearly stood to gain pleasures far more intense and refined than sex with the priestesses of Astarte, or a game of Hyperborean roulette.

Some people might get the impression that the centurion was no more than a pampered aesthete, who belonged not at the Jerusalem Station, but the Library of Alexandria; for many seasoned agents, however, this altogether forgivable misconception would turn out to be their last. Hell, for the longest time Fabricius even managed to lead on yours truly; as far as I was concerned, he was just another drop in the sea of young aristocrats who had recently flooded the upper ranks of the intelligence service. The tradition in Fabricius family was to take up a cushy job in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (as he had a famous ancestor known for his brilliant negotiations with Pyrrhus);⁷⁹ by all accounts, he should have been sitting on his ass in an embassy somewhere. So what the hell was he doing out here as a field handler?

I might have remained forever ignorant had the Center, concerned by the unrelenting wave of Palestinian terrorism, not undertaken yet another reorganization six years ago. This time around, they created the office of Regional Coordinator of the Activities of the Empires Special Services in the Near East, gave the affected spymasters a dual reporting line, and assigned the position to me.

Nota bene: the idea, in theory, was a sound one, but as usual, it was carried out completely ass-backwards. The eggheads in the Central Apparatus (the same ones who had spent their lives obsessed with maintaining secrecy between departments) suddenly put all their enthusiasm into merging everything they could and everything they couldnt. Well, as for giving our agency authority over the CIDs stations in the buffer states” around the Euphrates, that actually made some kind of sense: while all reports of Jewish nationalists ties to Parthian State Security have proven false up to now, you can never really be sure. But then those geniuses decided to saddle me with all the Army's special services, which led to some extremely unfortunate consequences. For more than a year (at which point Rome finally came to its senses and ended this nonsense), I was for some reason forced to oversee the joint intelligence of the Syrian Command (along with all its spy rings and special forces cohorts) and the territorial counterintelligence of the Border Guards, up to and including the military police of all six Asian legions. Military intelligence, who by this point we had managed to forge a surprisingly decent working relationship with, understandably considered this an outrageous encroachment on their turf, and from that moment on, I became something of a persona non grata at Headquarters. Even worse: it was right around that time that we suffered a completely inexplicable failure, which claimed the lives of two of our most valuable secret agents. While I wasn't able to gather any concrete evidence at the time (the investigation was closed by personal order of Sejanus), everything pointed to a completely intentional leak of information from Antioch. But like they say, even a mangy sheep's good for a little wool: that year, I managed to recruit some top men from the Army Special Forces to work for me as operatives. One of them, incidentally, was Demiurge.

⁷⁹ A real historical figure named Gaius Fabricius Luscinus, who famously refused Pyrrhus bribes when negotiating the release of Roman prisoners of war. (Z.B.)

But I digress. Anyway, back to Fabricius I vividly recall the acute sensation of envy that gripped me when I realized just what his seemingly small spy ring was capable of. To think the frivolous advisor had spent all this time building it right under my nose! Hardly any of his work concerned extremists (which fell outside of his purview anyway), but even so, the sheer number of informants and agents of influence he had in the upper ranks of Judean leadership simply boggled the mind. Only then did I come to appreciate the titanic effort that lay behind each flap of this spring butterflys pearly wings.

Admittedly, there were times when Fabricius left me incredibly annoyed with his extravagance; no matter what, however, the intricate schemes he devised would always turn out successful. And since I am firmly convinced that a mans luck (or lack thereof) is as much of an inborn trait as the color of his eyes or his ear for music, I got into the habit of seeing the centurions antics as a kind of tax on luxury; as the saying goes, better to lose with a wise man than to win with a fool. Still, strange as it may seem, I trusted him as much as you can possibly trust anyone in as peculiar a profession as ours. It was for this last reason that Fabricius was one of only two people I ever told about FISH, and the only one I let in on its operational details.

And so, sometime around noon on Thursday, 13 Nisan, the Cultural Advisor to the Administration of the Procurator of Judea, Gaius Fabricius, had dropped in on his dear friend Nicodemus to wish him a happy Passover, and was now engaging him in polite conversation. As usual, they began by discussing some recent news from the city. For example, the public was quietly rejoicing at the incredible luck of the famous rebel Eleazar, a living legend, who had once again managed to slip through the fingers of the Roman forces chasing after him despite losing many of his own men in the process. The advisor wryly observed that a man with such persistent luck clearly must be under the protection of a Higher Power; in the opinion of a highly learned member of the Sanhedrin, could the Messiah purely hypothetically! come down to Earth in the form of a highwayman? (It was actually Fabricius who convinced me to use Eleazar as a sort of cannibal rat. Without trying to brag, we made a really good job of it: in just three years, we managed to turn a second-rate criminal into the sole leader of the partisan movement, whose rise to the top saw him methodically gobble up all the other field commanders in central Judea. As for Eleazars gang itself, intelligence is managed by the equally legendary One-Eyed Simon, agent name Moraycommunications on alternating Tuesdays and Wednesdays via the blind beggar to the right of the entrance to the leather market)

Then, after confirming the confidentiality of their conversation, the advisor got down to brass tacks. On the one hand, he and Nicodemus were bound by their many years of friendship; on the other, he had enormous respect and sympathy for Yeshua Ha-Notsri and his preaching. Both these considerations now compelled him, Fabricius, to commit an act of malfeasance: disclosing an official secret. The previous day, the Secret Service sent the Procurators office a memorandum, the contents of which purely by chance he had also become aware of. It claimed that there was a traitor in Ha-Notsri's inner circle, with whose help the High Priest Caiaphas was apparently planning a provocation. By the looks of it, he was trying to make it seem as if a nefarious plot was afoot in Jerusalem, the main organizers of which were Yeshua and Nicodemus. In his hate for Nicodemus, which was no secret to anyone in the city, Caiaphas was certainly capable of no end of heinous acts. For this reason, the advisor strongly urged his friend to refrain from communicating with Ha-Notsri for the time being; if at all possible, however, he should send him a warning about the betrayal and a request for him to leave Jerusalem, if only for a short while. It went without saying that this conversation was completely confidential, so Nicodemus should mention in his warning that the information had leaked from inside the Sanhedrin.

Nicodemus was surprised, upset, enraged every emotion under the sun, but not afraid. Yes, he really had been in contact with Yeshua Ha-Notsri, and had never made a secret of it (although he never advertised it openly, either). Moreover, he was already planning to meet with Yeshua that very night in the Garden of Gethsemane. The prophet himself had arranged it several days before, clearly wanting to tell Nicodemus something important, and he would arrive that night at the appointed place, no matter who tried to stop him whether it be Caiaphas or Beelzebub himself. Nicodemus deeply appreciated the advisors selflessness (disclosing an official secret was no laughing matter) and thanked him for the warning. Now that he mentioned it, there really was something strange going on at the Sanhedrin for the past couple of nights, a band of armed cutthroats was keeping watch in the courtyard. In the advisors opinion, could Caiaphas have made himself so paranoid, he was genuinely expecting the conspirators to knock back a few glasses of anisette and come storm the Sanhedrin any minute now?

But luckily, he could pass on the warning to Yeshua that very day. During their meeting several days ago (goddamn it, why doesnt Judas tell me about any of this? Is he sleeping on the job or something?), Yeshua asked him to find a place in Jerusalem where he and his disciples could have their Passover dinner in peace. Why Jerusalem, and not Bethany, Nicodemus didnt know. Naturally, he offered up his own house, but Yeshua graciously refused; in his opinion, it would be dangerous for the host. And since, in Yeshuas words, the surveillance units in Jerusalem were really stepping on his toes, they would enter the city without any fanfare and proceed as quickly and discreetly as possible to the room prepared for their meal.

That morning, Yeshua, as promised, sent two of his disciples into the city Which two? He honestly didnt know; what difference did it make, though? Anyway, the disciples were met by the gate and shown the house in question; yes, it was the house of an honorable man, although he wasnt in Jerusalem at the moment. By this point, the disciples were most certainly outside the city, somewhere in Gethsemane (a shame we just missed them we could have passed on the message to them directly), though later this evening, they would lead Yeshua and the others here to celebrate Passover. He and Yeshua had even agreed on where to leave a message inside the house if an emergency arose and now it had; they must have had a crystal ball. Following this, the advisor bid Nicodemus adieu, noting to himself that from a professional point of view, the guys were doing a surprisingly good job. And while he was at it, he really ought to check what was up with those nighttime patrols in the Sanhedrin's courtyard?

So in one sense, the situation had cleared up, but in another, it had grown even more confusing. Ultimately, in assuming that Caiaphas was trying to nail Yeshua and Nicodemus in one blow for political conspiracy, we had started from the premise that he was using John as a liaison. If, on the other hand, this contact had actually occurred on Yeshua's initiative, and John's involvement in it was nothing more than a coincidence, then that brought us right back to square one: what task could the high priest have actually entrusted the defector with? At least we were giving the warning to Ha-Notsri today; we couldn't have given it any earlier, through Judas there was no possible source he could have cited. Likewise, for obvious reasons, we couldn't disclose the traitor's name to Ha-Notsri; now, however, that no longer mattered.

By six o'clock that evening, our operatives had closed off all the approaches to Nicodemus's friend's house; I had made the firm decision to liquidate John that very night, while the sect was conveniently out of police protection. In the worst case scenario, we had a back-up plan: paying the traitor a nighttime visit in the middle of Gethsemane, where, as we now knew full well, the sect would be spending the night. Out of nowhere, however, Fabricius decided he wanted to lead this routine operation himself: Allow me, chief! After a moment's hesitation, he added: For some reason, I have a terrible feeling about this, and it's hardly ever let me down before. Maybe I'll notice something when I get there. Somewhat alarmed

(I was more than aware of the centurions fantastic intuition), I did what I could: I reinforced our surveillance units in the Lower City and placed Decurion Petronius platoon of special forces on five-minute alert. Now all we could do was wait.

Sometime closer to midnight, I was greeted by the sight of an extremely rattled Fabricius. After casually reporting that he had indefinitely postponed Johns liquidation, he asked me if anyone had been in contact with Judas in the past few days. I replied quite bluntly that the centurion would do well to explain himself on the subject of John before anything else. All he could do was throw up his handsyes, of course he would, but first, I needed to immediately send for the head of the surveillance unit monitoring the approaches to the Sanhedrin; I would understand why in a moment.

Excuse me, chief, but on precisely what grounds were we certain that the traitor was specifically John?

What do you mean, what grounds? From Judas report and the dispatches from our informants in the Sanhedrin.

Thats exactly it. Its just that if you look at these pieces of information separately, it becomes clear that they dont support each other in any way. That Yeshua was betrayed is a fact; but as for the traitor being John, or a person that looks like John, that was something we discovered, if you recall, by means of leading questions. And thats a slippery slope, chief